public the private business of the railroad companies. But I respond that a railroad company has no private business; it is the mere agent of the public's business connected with the railroad. The evils that publicity will remedy, while they are in part at least conjectural, must be almost incalculable in their baleful effects. At present the railroad directors and managers seem to be accountable to no one. The stockholders, and by the way the stock is largely held by the public, have no means of knowing how much of the revenue of the road is given in rebates, how much is subscribed for campaign purposes, how much used in influencing legislation.

Under the present régime it is altogether possible for the management of a railroad to make its stock comparatively worthless one year and of great value the next, while its business remains nearly uniform. For example, one of the great anthracite coal-carrying roads, a majority of whose stock is owned by the owners of the great coal mines, a little over a year ago was selling at 45 cents which to-day is quoted at $1.61. The freight on coal was as high then as now. It was approximately doing the same amount of business. It would appear that some one has noticed the handwriting on the wall and concluded that the time was approaching when those who would receive the earnings of that great road must own its stock. Publicity would injure no honest interest. It would go far indeed to restrain that species of robbery which is affected by deception and cunning.

While I have the profoundest respect for all the constitutional safeguards surrounding private property and protecting vested interests, I favor with all my heart this legislation that will give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to substitute a reasonable rate wherever an unfair rate has been found to exist, and to substitute a proper rate for one that is discriminatory.

Much has been said and printed upon this subject. All the powers of human ingenuity have been taxed to the uttermost to find objections to this plain, conservative remedy. It has been said that it will unsettle and confuse the existing system of rates. There is no authority in this bill to interfere in the slightest degree with any existing railroad that is doing its duty. The only railroad that can possibly be affected thereby is one that is willfully disregarding its legal obligations by taking advantage of its official position to despoil the interstate commerce of our country by taking extortionate tolls or that has offended by unjust discrimination.

To wholly escape interference the railroad company has but to do its duty—observe its contract obligation which it took upon itself when it first accepted its charter and it can in no manner be affected.

I have been surprised how many dispute the plain proposition that the railroads are public property and the railroad companies public servants. They seem to be afflicted with an intellectual perversity that compels them to combat this doctrine, although every railroad company in America has asserted it again and again. They have obtained judgments in all the courts of record from Maine to California that were predicated upon nothing else. They repeat and re-repeat the vicious, wicked legal heresy that the railroads are private property, as though they expect by so doing, after a time, to give it the force and effect of law and thereby to confiscate the public's rights in the nation's highways.

Can it be that public officials free from all improper influences, sworn to perform their duty, all of whose transactions are to be public, keeping a record open to all the public, are less capable of doing impartial justice than railroad officials, whose pockets are filled with gift stock in the principal shipping corporations along the line, who are accountable to no one except a board of directors elected by a majority of the stock gathered together, perhaps, at the expense of millions?

Recurring again to the speech of my colleague from Ohio, delivered in the last Congress, we find the statement "that in Ohio there is a constitutional provision that absolutely prohibits the State legislature, in its own behalf or in the behalf of individuals, to contribute one dollar of money to the building of a railway, and there is not within the geographical limits of Ohio one foot of railway built by public money, unless it was before the constitution of 1851." That is true, Mr. Chairman, and the gentleman seemed to regard it as a conclusive argument combating the proposition for which I contend. There is, however, in every charter granted in the State of Ohio full and complete specifications of the public improvement which the corporation must construct and build for the public, and the corporation covenants and agrees to build exactly the road specified by the State when it accepts the charter. It takes in lieu of its money expended in construction and in operation a franchise to collect reasonable tolls, to remain in the possession of the railway forever maintaining and operating it. It is true that the legal title—the mere naked legal title to the land occupied—stands in the name of the railroad corporation. But it is a mere naked legal title, without one particle of beneficial use whatever. The use is vested forever in the public. Not one of the stockholders, nor all combined, have a right to use that highway for their own private purposes because they are stockholders, but only because they, like you and I, are members of the public. Why, this is elementary in the law. Every tyro knows it.

And what is ownership but the right to use and enjoy, secured to one by the operation of law? Such ownership every member of the American public has to every railroad in America. My distinguished colleague from Ohio, evidently in a desire to invoke and throw around this legislation something of difficulty, begged of us to remember, in his very eloquent speech, that the railroad corporations got privileges and rights from the State governments; begged us to remember that the right of eminent domain came from the State governments. Well, what of it? The right of eminent domain comes from the people, from the public. The public domain inheres in the American public. There are not forty-five public domains nor is there one great public domain, a fragment of which belongs to the people of each State and a tattered remnant of which belongs to the National Government. But there is one great public domain that belongs entire to the American people and over this, within its limitations under the Constitution, the National Government may divest any part of that public domain from private ownership and devote it to the public weal. So the various State governments, which within certain limitations are also the agents of the American public, may, within their constitutional limitations, exercise this power.

The citizen living in Maine has secured to him by the law and the Constitution the right to use and enjoy the railroads in California and Texas. To paraphrase the language of the distinguished Justice Black in the speech to which I have referred:

> The American railroad corporations, wherever located, are charged with the duty of seeing that every needed facility for the use of the thoroughfare under its care shall be furnished to all American citizens upon equal terms, like the justice promised in Magna Charta, without sale, denial, or delay.

In this connection I can not refrain from again recurring to the speech of my colleague from Ohio in the last Congress, where we have a legal opinion impliedly expressed which I might characterize as something good, something new, something which nobody knew before. It is set forth in this language:

> If the General Government can fix the price of railroad transportations, why not the price of the labor which is a necessary incident of railroad transportation? If it is just and right and intelligent to fix the price upon which a train load of freight can be carried from New York to San Francisco, why, as an incident of that power, is it not just to fix the price of the hired men who are necessarily required to handle that freight?

Here in these rhetorical questions we have the expression of a legal opinion that there is no distinction between the Government control of railroad rates and Government control of strictly private property secured by all the guaranties of the Constitution, such as coal mines or one's own personal labor. To this opinion we must accord the merit, if it be a merit, of entire originality. It might be said to be a legal opinion "after the order of Melchizedek," for it is absolutely without antecedent in all the literature of the law, and yet my distinguished colleague, believing that the right to control transportation was a strictly private right like the ownership in a coal mine or a blast furnace, voted for the Esch-Townsend bill in the last session in obedience to what he stigmatizes as "a mere public clamor." This opinion and this act makes perfectly consistent what the gentleman said about our being well on the way to socialism, to Government control of corporations, etc. I deny, in the first place, that the widespread demand for this legislation that has found voice from one end of this land to the other is "a mere public clamor." It is, upon the other hand, a great, persistent, determined appeal of an earnest people calling for justice, calling, too, strictly within their constitutional rights, calling for legislation not new in its principle, revolutionary in its operation, but for legislation that will restore the ancient landmarks; that will be a getting away back to first principles.

It would have been competent for the Legislature to have fixed a complete schedule of rates in the charter of every railroad corporation; but it would have been unwise, as rates should change or vary with changing or varying conditions. The courts have universally held, wherever the question has come up, that the making of a railroad rate is a legislative act.

For fifty years railroad corporations have exercised this legislative function, which was conferred upon them by mere implication. If the Legislature could delegate this power by implication alone to the railroad corporations, what possible reason can gentlemen conjure up in their minds why the Legislature may not, by expressed terms, by a carefully considered enactment, empower a public commission to supervise their actions? In every one of their charters when they took them was written the existing law as it then was, and it was understood to be a part of their contract with the public that their rates should always be reasonable.

Members of the public in dealing with the roads as a rule do not stand upon an equality from the very nature of the business transacted between the railroad and the individual. He in ordinary cases is not able to protect himself. He is absolutely at the mercy of the railroad corporation, and it is a very mockery of a remedy to suggest that if he is not treated squarely and fairly upon the highway built for him he can have a remedy in the courts. In a multitude of cases the entire value of the shipment which the citizen desires and has a right to make would not be sufficient to pay a good lawyer for his opinion as to what remedy he could get in the courts.

As to how the unfair treatment of the shipper by the railroad would be corrected by the plan of procedure in the courts we may illustrate it fairly by what one of its advocates urges in its favor. Recurring again to the speech of my colleague from Ohio, I quote his exact language:

> Why, Mr. Chairman, in the State of Ohio very recently a great north and south railroad line refused to attach the switch of a coal producer to its main track and claimed that it had coal enough contracted for all its carrying possibilities. This coal was interstate-commerce coal, mined for interstate-commerce purposes, sold for interstate-commerce purposes, coming clearly within the scope and purview of the Addyston Pipe case. A suit was brought in the State court to oust that railroad company of its charter and put it in the hands of a receiver because it did not do its duty by its patrons and because it discriminated in favor of the few. There was no statute on that topic in Ohio. There was the common-law remedy. The suit was brought, and it was hotly contested, until the railroad company, upon the hearing of motions and demurrers preliminary to the great struggle that was to come upon the question of fact, saw the handwriting on the wall and yielded and took on the switch.

Now, let us assume that this controversy had arisen over a typical case. Let us assume that a farmer had asked for a car to carry his hogs to market. The railroad company refused him and claimed that it had hogs enough contracted for all its carrying possibilities. These hogs were interstate-commerce hogs, raised for interstate-commerce purposes, sold for interstate-commerce purposes. A suit was brought in the State court to oust that railroad company of its charter and put it into the hands of a receiver, because it did not do its duty by its patrons and because it discriminated in favor of the few. There was no statute on that topic in Ohio. There was the common-law remedy. The suit was brought, and it was hotly contested until the railroad company, upon hearing of motions and demurrers preliminary to the great struggle that was to come upon the question of fact, saw the handwriting on the wall and yielded and took on the hogs. Why, the farmer, anticipating unfair treatment upon the part of a carrier in a case like this, would have to ask for a car before he commenced to fatten his hogs.

When the children cry for bread, would you give them a stone? So it is that the American people, fretted and oppressed and annoyed by petty grievances against the management of their own great highways, have been led to look upon that bill which seeks to remedy these things by granting new courts and new procedure in courts as a very mockery. They regard it as a legislative gold brick.

And while the bill which we present may have in it errors and shortcomings, it is a long step in the right direction. It is in accord with the great public wish and will. It recognizes the true character of the railroad. It is not in the direction of Government possession and control of railroads. Upon the other hand, that threadbare heresy that railroads are private property stands right down the broad highway leading to Government possession. If the railroads are private property, there is no legal, no constitutional barrier to prevent their being taken by the Government for public use. If, upon the other hand, their status is as I contend—if they are now the property of the people, placed by solemn covenant and contract in the possession and control of railroad corporations—that principle stands barring forever the approach to Government possession, and we can have Government possession only by anarchy or revolution.

Tell me, ye students of the Constitution, where is there vested anywhere in our Government power to terminate this contract or to violate this solemn covenant? The several States in granting railroad charters were acting clearly within their power as agents for the American people. And the contract thereby made binds the American public, where those charters are perpetual, forever. It will scarcely be contended that there is any power either in the legislature or in the courts to annul or advoid a contract thus duly made and ratified.

It has been suggested here that there is an undefined zone between a fair rate under this bill and a confiscatory rate. I do not think so. A fair rate, a fairly compensatory rate, whatever that may be, the railroad has an absolute right to have. The word "compensatory" fixes the manner in which that rate shall be determined. It puts a quietus to the nonsense about railroad rates being determined by what the traffic will stand. It is to be a fairly compensatory rate. Now, whatever that is, if the rate fixed by the Commission be the fraction of one poor cent lower than a fair compensatory rate, it becomes confiscatory to that extent, because that rate is fixed by contract. Ninety-nine per cent of the railroad charters in America were issued and taken when the law was clearly defined in the decisions of this country that the right of the railroad was to have a fairly compensatory rate.

Something has been suggested here about whether or not the Legislature of the United States has power to delegate to a commission what this bill provides it shall do. It seems there can be no question in this regard. I shall not cite authorities, but I wish to call the attention of this House to the fact that there is no distinction between what we ask this Commission to do and what county commissioners all over the country do now.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman is a member of the committee, as I understand it?

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information. On page 10 of this bill I find this language:

> That the Commission is authorized to determine and prescribe what will in its judgment be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate of charges.

Then I find on page 11 where you authorize an appeal that the rate shall be kept in effect until it be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. Now, suppose that the Commission fix a rate that is not just and reasonable and fairly remunerative and at the same time is not confiscatory. Now, is it the intention of this bill to authorize an appeal to the court so that they may set it aside, not on the ground of confiscation, but on the ground that it is not a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate, and to give them a better jurisdiction to determine that question?

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Why, if I understand the gentleman's question, a rate that is less than a fairly remunerative rate must to the extent it is less be a confiscatory rate.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. One that is less than a fairly remunerative rate would be confiscatory?

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. If it be less than a fairly remunerative rate it must of necessity be confiscatory, because the right to charge a fair rate is not for the first time granted in this bill. It has been an absolute right to the railroad ever since it was built.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, you construe "fairly remunerative" to mean "confiscatory."

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. No; a fairly remunerative rate is not confiscatory.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why not strike out the language "fairly remunerative?" I would just like to know the meaning of that term.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. It is a direction to the Commission as to how they shall determine a rate. Under this language in the bill I take it that the rule of fixing rates which the railroad companies have said that they follow—to charge what the traffic will bear—is condemned by this phrase. Railroads being public highways, I contend that a city having but one railroad, and not needing two—there being no reason why the public should be taxed for the building of two roads—the people living in that city on a single road should have as fair rates as though there were dozens of railroads there. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman ten minutes more to conclude his remarks.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, no vested right of or contract obligation to the railroad companies will be disturbed in the least. Their right to the possessions of the railroads themselves must not be interfered with; their enjoyment of every franchise which was granted them is to be held sacred. The publicity which we seek will immensely benefit the stockholders and employees of the railroads, for then railroad earnings which are legally collected for the benefit of stockholders and to pay operating expenses can no longer be stolen from the public funds and devoted to illegal uses. Railroad stocks should immediately be enhanced in value by Government inspection. This should be welcomed by all stockholders in railroads, as the security and protection from imposition and fraud thereby accruing to them would be as great as the security given to the owner of bank stock by the official inspection of United States banks.

In their crusade against this legislation the railroad companies took occasion to excite the fear of their employees that this legislation would affect the ability of the roads to pay good wages. I wish to illustrate the groundlessness of this fear by a simple illustration. Certain lines of railroad carrying coke from the Connellsville district to South Chicago during the year 1903 gave to a little terminal railroad in its division of a two-dollar rate from Connellsville to South Chicago 70 cents on every ton. This amounted to one and a quarter million dollars during that year, which was $1,000,000 at least more than the terminal road had any decent claim to. The two-dollar rate was a fair rate, and the roads doing the work gave up because of lack of proper Government supervision and control a round million that ought to have been kept in their treasuries to pay workmen and to pay dividends on their stock. This money would have given to each conductor who gave an order with reference to these coke trains a salary of $5,000; to every engineer who pulled a throttle to move one of these trains $5,000 a year, and to each brakeman that adjusted a coupling pin upon one of those cars $1,000 more than he got and still have money left in the treasury of the company to have paid something at least in addition to what was paid to the stockholders.

I congratulate the country in this latter-day awakening, this revival of political integrity, this widespread national movement to have everywhere a square deal. We have in the Presidential chair a great leader; a leader whose training and development for the work of this generation must have commenced ages before he was born. Without such a leader our cause would be well-nigh hopeless. In a crusade like this the efforts of the people have seemed to be paralyzed because they have not known whom they could trust. His splendid courage, his devotion to high ideals, his prejudices in favor of old-fashioned, common honesty, justice, and truth have assured us that not all the seductive songs of all the sirens to tempt him from the good old ship's helm would cause him to steer a crooked course. Behind him and us in this matter stands a great, united people, strong and consistent in their love for constitutional law and respect for private property. I repudiate indignantly every imputation that attributes to the great public—when it asserts this, its rights—any ungenerous purpose to disregard the rights of private property.

I am not of that number who believe that justice and generosity will perish from the earth when this generation passes away; and I do know that no man has an honest fear for which he can give a reason that when the American people, now pressing their demand for simple justice, now claiming the exercise of that power which belongs to them and to which they have a clear right, shall come into the possession of their own will exercise that power in any other than a generous spirit. We are not on the road to socialism or anarchy or Government possession. The American people do not favor any of these things. They can be more safely trusted than any single man. It has been said that the voice of the people is the voice of God. It certainly can be asserted that the long-suffering patience of the American people has been like the patience of God, and it requires no prophet to assert that the generosity of the American people toward everything of merit will continue to be magnanimous and fair, even after we have passed away.

The people want simply a square deal—

And shall we not give them justice? Great God! For justice all times are opportune and every place a temple.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague [Mr. STERLING], such time as he may desire.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, the great importance of this bill is not found in its provisions, although its practical operation, if it becomes a law, will do much, I hope, to remedy existing evils, and more to prevent the further encroachment by transportation methods upon the natural law of commerce.

If this bill becomes a law, as important as it is, the most important feature of it will be the fact of its passage. It will indicate that Congress is facing in the right direction and that it will not hesitate to exercise its power under the Constitution to regulate great public utilities when conditions demand it in the interests of the people.

The present-day centralization of great wealth and consequent great power about public utilities creates a condition which will eventually result in one of two alternatives, either Government regulation or Government ownership of these vast properties.

The first is the supremely preferable alternative. Indeed, it seems to me to be the only alternative that can be accepted by fair and enlightened minds, and the only one that conserves the interest of the public or the individual.

The presentation of this bill in this House, the unanimous report of this committee, without regard to party, recommending its passage, and the fair prospect of it becoming a law are all benignant signs that the Congress of the United States has set out upon a consistent and conservative course to regulate by law these ever-increasing forces, which, although they have wrought much good, are susceptible of working much harm.

I believe this measure to be conservative. It does not involve a subject that requires radical or extreme action, nor is it a theme that will justify intemperate speech. It calls for a cool and fair discussion of the legal and practical aspects of railroad-rate legislation as proposed by its provisions.

Public agitation has brought forth a flood of light. Much has been said and written on either side of the question since the discussion began. One year ago the public mind on both sides of the question was groping in the dark. One side believed that the merger of vast railroad interests had no other design and could necessarily have no other result than the oppression of the people. The other side feared that the strong public sentiment which prevailed would bring about legislation that would result in the practical confiscation of the properties of the railroad companies. The happening of either of these things would have been highly injurious both to the people and to the railroads. In this day when transportation enters into the commercial life of the people so largely the welfare of the railroads and the welfare of the people are interwoven and necessarily inseparable. When the needs of every community demand the products of every other community transportation becomes an important factor in the prosperity of every citizen. Transportation is the most important element in all commerce because it touches every individual, and hence the necessity of a just and fair regulation of it.

Much has been said through the press on the legal aspect of the right of Congress to legislate on this question. If Congress has the express power under the Constitution to pass such legislation as this, it is contained in the clause which gives Congress the right to regulate commerce between the States. It has been contended that this clause does not confer the power to regulate railroad-rate charges because the framers of the Constitution did not and could not have had such regulation in mind when they framed that instrument. It is probably true that the Convention had only in mind some plan whereby the Central Government could prevent and avoid the restrictions and limitations which the several States under the Articles of the Confederation could and sometimes did impose on commerce coming from the other States. It was certainly the main purpose of that Convention to place the General Government in a position to make trade between the States as free as possible; and to take away from the State that power to levy duty against a sister State, which had done so much to engender rancor and local prejudices under the confederation.

It may be conceded, too, that no member of that Convention ever thought that the power delegated by that clause would be appealed to to regulate the charges of a common carrier. Certainly it was not thought that railroad companies would be affected by it, for they did not exist for more than forty years after its adoption. The framers, in all their wisdom, never dreamed of present conditions. They never knew the extent of the country and its resources and the immense possibilities of development. They supposed that rivers and canals would continue forever to be the great highways of travel and transportation. How could they have had in mind present conditions or the application of that clause in the Constitution to present conditions? There is no possibility of a quarrel as to the facts.

But, Mr. Chairman, I submit it is a most narrow rule that construes the Constitution literally by what the framers had in mind at the time of its adoption. If John Marshall and the great expounders of that instrument had always interpreted it strictly by what the Convention had in mind when framing it, we would have long since outgrown it. But it seems as well suited to the needs of this generation as any former generation. This is due largely to the fact that courts and judges have been large enough to construe it in the light of conditions existing at the time the interpretation was made rather than in view of what the makers of the Constitution had in mind when the instrument was made. The framers of the Constitution were wise enough to make use of the most general, rather than specific terms, and our courts have been wise enough to give to those terms their broader rather than their narrower meaning. It is literally true to say that our organic law has grown great to meet the needs of a great nation. The Constitution is our Constitution, and the courts ought and will interpret it in the light of our needs and conditions, so far as it is reasonably open to interpretation; and thus it becomes an aid instead of a hindrance to the progress of civilization.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the framers of the Constitution never had in mind the great railway mail system of the present day—a system put into direct operation by Congress through that power delegated to it to "establish post-offices and post-roads"—yet is it not as reasonable to say that Congress transgressed the Constitution then because it exercised that power in a way never thought of as to say Congress now transgresses the Constitution because it proposes to regulate interstate commerce by the exercise of its constitutional power in a way not thought of in the beginning?

I am certainly of the opinion that when the courts come to pass on the constitutionality of a great public law like this they will apply those two rules of construction, which authorize them to consider the conditions to which the law relates and which require them to give to the terms of the Constitution their broadest significance.

Let me suggest in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that it is not impossible, and may be probable, that now, when the conditions of the life insurance business presents such strong reasons for Federal supervision, the courts would hold that life insurance transactions are commerce. The aspect of the thing involved has much to do with judicial determination. When a new departure is proposed, we are often prone to ask ourselves the question, Can it be done? We sometimes reach a negative conclusion at first thought simply because it never has been done.

Recurring to the bill before the House, there is another class of logicians who admit that Congress has the power, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, to fix rates for interstate transportation, but deny it the power to delegate the authority. Of course no legislative body can delegate the authority to legislate. Congress can not give to the Interstate Commerce Commission, or to any other tribunal, the right to make laws. These are purely first principles. The legality of the main provision of the law, then, hinges on the proposition as to whether the authority which Congress proposes to confer on the Commission is legislative in its character.

Section 15 of the bill, stripped of all collateral verbiage, provides as follows:

> The Commission is empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon complaint made, it is of the opinion that any of the rates or charges are unjust or unreasonable, to determine and prescribe what, in its judgment, is a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate, to be thereafter observed in such cases as the maximum rate.

Section 1 requires all common carriers to establish "just and reasonable rates" for the transportation of passengers and property.

When Congress has said that a rate shall be "just and reasonable," it has prescribed a rule of conduct, and that is a fair and ancient definition of law. It has defined the character of the rate to be fixed. It would seem that when the legislature has done that it has exhausted the legislative function. The act of ascertaining whether a certain rate comes within the rule laid down by the law or, in other words, whether a certain rate is "just and reasonable" is merely the finding of a fact, and hence an act purely administrative of the law.

If in the performance of this administrative act the Commission discovers that the rate complained of is unjust and unreasonable, then there necessarily flows from the same act the finding of another fact, and that is the fact that a certain other rate is just and reasonable. The act of the Commission is simply the act of a master in chancery or a referee. It finds the fact. It notifies the parties in interest. If they are content, they abide by it. If not, they can have the finding reviewed by the court.

So far as my observation goes, those who contend that such a law is unconstitutional, on the ground that it delegates legislative power to the Commission, start with the assumption that to find a fact like that of ascertaining a "just and reasonable" rate is a legislative function. With this assertion as a starting point, they very readily and logically reach the conclusion which they desire, viz, that this provision violates the Constitution.

I can conceive that it is entirely proper for the legislature itself to find the fact, to ascertain the rate, and insert it in lieu of the description "just and reasonable," but such an act is by no means necessarily a legislative act, and in this case would be so impracticable as to amount to an impossibility. Nor is the finding of a fact necessarily a judicial function. It may be and often is a judicial duty. A purely judicial function consists of the application of the law to the fact.

I well remember when I was a boy there was a strong public sentiment in the State where I lived for a law limiting rate charges for passengers and freight. This agitation was the basis of the granger movement. Legislatures were elected on that issue. It was contended that such a law was in violation of the rights of ownership of property. It said that it took away from the person his inherent authority over his own property, and that if the government could dictate to common carriers the price they should charge for the use of their property the same rule must extend to all persons under the law, and that it meant merely the power to confiscate at the will of the legislature. Of course all such argument is disposed of by the one fact that common carriers are charged with a public use. A railroad is a quasi-public utility.

Since then many, if not all, of the States have placed limitations on rate charges by legislative action. These laws have been sustained by the courts. Not only have the State legislatures prescribed maximum rates in specific terms, but they also have prescribed what rates should be reasonable, and imposed upon some other tribunal the duty of ascertaining what rate is reasonable. The courts have also sustained these enactments.

Let us reason, then, by analogy. The States, having general dominion over commerce within their boundaries, can regulate railroad rates, so also the Federal Government, having general dominion over commerce between the States, can regulate railroad rates. The conclusion is irresistible.

There is still another ground, and to my mind a very safe one, on which Congress can justify this measure. That is the broad ground of public policy. If the Constitution were silent we would be not wholly at sea on this question. Legislatures and courts have made countless laws for the sake of public policy. As a general legal proposition that which is in contravention of public policy is void. The first true consideration of every public body is the public good. Every man must mold his rights to fit into and not transgress the public welfare.

If we go back to first principles we will be reminded that in England not very long ago the price and charge of almost every tradesman was fixed by law. It was justified on the ground of public policy and rendered necessary by existing conditions. The blacksmith and the innkeeper had their charges prescribed by statute. The size and price of every loaf of bread was fixed by ordinance. The condition was that each community had but one tradesman of a kind, and thus there could be no competition. There were no means of transportation by which a manufacturer could invade the territory of another engaged in the same line. Hence it was that each producer had a veritable monopoly in his community. For the public good, Government assumed the right to fix the rates. Then monopoly was made possible for the want of transportation; now it is made possible by reason of transportation. The facilities for carrying commerce are so great and so universal that one shipper, if he is powerful enough to control these instrumentalities of trade, can invade all regions and destroy all competitors. If Government in those days could justify its strong arm in regulating rates for the purpose of defeating monopoly, so can it in these days; nor will it be answered by the cry of confiscation.

The States prescribe the rate of interest which the money lender shall receive. How can Government justify that? On no other ground than that of public policy. If it can say what remuneration shall be received by the man who has money invested in notes and mortgages, it can with equal wisdom prescribe the remuneration to the man who owns stocks and bonds.

It seems unfortunate to me that this bill does not provide that the common carrier shall own its own equipment, or at least that it shall not operate other equipment than its own or the equipment of some other bona fide common carrier. Transportation in certain lines might be greatly simplified by such a requirement, and opportunity for unfair charges, rebates, and discriminations greatly lessened.

It is true that private and refrigerator car lines have done much to develop and make possible very important industries. In this regard they have been of wonderful benefit to the people. Much of the fruit-growing lands have been made available for use by reason of the refrigerator-car service. All of the fruit-growing West has found a market in the more densely populated East, and the East has found a supply in the fruit-growing regions of the West by means of this advanced and modern kind of transportation. It has made it possible to distribute fresh meats throughout the country, and thus this method of transportation has made itself useful and necessary to the people.

I am well aware that there are serious, but by no means insurmountable, objections to this proposition. It is urged that such a law would find the railroads of the country wholly unprepared to meet the demands in certain lines of shipment and that, as a consequence, the shippers and the public would suffer. It is also urged that it would amount to a confiscation of the cars and carrying equipment of private-car lines and of individual shippers who own their own cars. The present practice of railroad companies hauling the cars of shippers and of private-car lines has grown up under the law, and it would be a harsh provision to require the one to equip itself, or to prohibit the other from using its property, without ample opportunity to prepare for the change. The change could be required to be made gradually, and the more gradual the better for the public. When the law requiring all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to adopt and use the automatic couplers and other safety appliances was passed, it was feared that transportation and the business of the country would be greatly interfered with during the change. There was not a ripple.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that if Congress should provide a law making it unlawful for a common carrier to haul a car, carrying freight, when the car does not belong to it, or to some other bona fide common carrier, and then provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall regulate the transition, that the common carriers would have ample time to equip themselves and the private-car owner or line ample time to dispose of its carrying equipment, even to consuming such equipment by use, the change could be made without loss to the parties and without injury or inconvenience to the public.

I think there has been much effort put forth through numerous publications to mislead the public as to the purpose of the Administration in recommending this legislation. The writers of these articles have sought to make it appear that it was the design of the President and the House to give into the hands of the Commission the power to arbitrarily fix all rates and adjust all schedules and classifications. No one in authority, so far as I know, certainly not the President, has ever suggested such legislation or even entertained such a purpose. The most ardent champions of rate legislation in Congress have never intended such a stupendous and unnecessary task.

With this assumption as a basis, these opponents have sounded the alarm. They have charged that such a course meant dire and dismal disaster to the transportation interests of the country. It has been asserted that it would result in confusion, then panic, then ruin.

They have shown, too, with much force, that transportation is so closely related to every other interest and industry of the country that when it falls it must drag down with it in one mass of ruins the business of the manufacturer, the farmer, the mechanic on the heads of a suffering people. The trouble with this argument is that it is aimed at a proposition that was never before the country. It is sufficient to say that the railroad interests of the country need have no fear that a President or a Congress who have the interests of the people at heart will ever do anything that will bring ruin to transportation interests. They observe the relation of these interests to the prosperity of the country. The railroads ought to observe the relation of the people to their own prosperity.

It is safe to say that this legislation will have absolutely no effect on the general trend of the business of the country. The railroads will observe and obey its provisions. There will not be nearly so many prosecutions under it as there are now complaints of the evils which it proposes to remedy. A thousand acts committed each day are perfectly moral and innocent in themselves. To-morrow a new law goes into effect which renders all such acts unlawful. It does not follow that there will be a thousand prosecutions each day against these acts, because the instant they became unlawful they cease. It is the law itself, rather than the prosecutions under the law that deters the offense. And so it will be with this law. It will be in the main observed. Discriminations and rebates will cease by virtue of the law. Violations will be few and consequently prosecutions will be few, enough perhaps to keep before the eye of corporate greed the fact that the people are all powerful, and that their will is the supreme and living law, and that this—the people's Government—will not brook the insolence of aggregate wealth.

The course of trade will not be checked or turned aside by this legislation. Not one wheel of transportation will cease to turn. The current will flow on without a ripple, and the people will come into possession of their own—the right to control, regulate, and direct the destiny of their own creatures.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, there is one danger ahead. These great aggregations of capital, which are so rapidly forming in our midst, may be a blessing or a curse. If the power which flows therefrom be turned into right channels it will lift up and save free institutions, if into wrong channels it may destroy them. It is at all times the duty of the Government to be stronger than this power, that it may control and direct the course it shall take. If it is a just Government it will see that every citizen has a free and equal chance with every other. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] forty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for forty-five minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is one of unusual importance. The subject with which it deals is one that has engaged the interest of the people throughout the length and breadth of the land for a number of years. It proposes legislation in a domain never before entered by the Federal Congress—that of fixing rates, in a limited way, for interstate transportation. The most conspicuous, if not the most important, feature of the bill is that which confers upon the Interstate Comerce Commission the power to investigate a given rate upon complaint and, if the rate is found to be unjust and unreasonable, to establish a reasonable maximum rate in its stead.

I do not propose to enter at length into a discussion of the constitutional authority of Congress to confer this power upon any inferior tribunal or commission. The Federal Constitution expressly declares that all legislative power is vested in the Congress. That important provision was embodied in the Constitution as an essential part of an harmonious and scientific plan of government. The courts have frequently decided that where legislative authority is expressly bestowed upon a legislative body that body has no power to delegate such authority to any other organism of the Government. It has been held by the courts, with practical unanimity, that the function of investigating an existing transportation rate with a view of determining whether it is just and reasonable is a judicial function, but that the power to fix a rate to be operative in the future is a legislative power; but the Supreme Court of the United States has never decided whether Congress is authorized to confer the rate-making power upon a subordinate commission.

I have in mind the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, expressed in a letter he addressed to a Senate committee about a year ago, in which he took the position that when Congress enacted that all rates for transportation should be just and reasonable it exercised all of the legislative power that was involved in rate making, and when it authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to inquire into rates and, if found to be unjust and unreasonable, to substitute what it conceived to be just and reasonable rates in the place of those existing, the Commission did not exercise legislative power, but simply ascertained the facts and applied them to the law. As a lawyer I am not altogether prepared to accept this rather refined doctrine, but I am willing to support the bill and leave this somewhat uncertain law question for the courts to decide.

There is no doubt that Congress has the power to fix rates of transportation upon interstate traffic, but its constitution, organization, and temper are such as to render it practically impossible for that branch of government to deal intelligently with so grave and delicate a problem, and it will be a great disappointment to the country if the courts shall ultimately hold that that power can not be delegated to the Intersate Commerce Commission or some other like tribunal.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY], who just preceded me in this debate, took a rather extreme view of the relations of railroad companies to the public. He insisted that railroads are public highways and that railroad property is public property, and that railroad companies in operating their respective roads are in the execution of a public trust. Railroads, as a rule, are built by private capital and private enterprise. They are operated and controlled by private management, and in all of the decisions of the courts and all the literature, both political and legal, bearing upon the question, they are classified as private property. It is true railroad companies exercise one of the important powers of government, that of eminent domain, and they are charged by the law with the performance of certain duties that are of a public character, and for these reasons the Government has always insisted on a larger measure of control of the affairs of those companies than of any other kind of private enterprise. When a railroad company constructs a line of road, in the absence of any express statute it impliedly undertakes to serve the public upon equal terms and at just and reasonable rates. So it is not necessary to take the extreme position that railroads are already public property in order that the Government may have adequate authority to enforce reasonable control over them to carry out the purpose of their creation.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] yesterday, in a very able and excellent speech, expressed a fear of the consequences of the concentration of wealth in the hands of private corporations, and he delivered some very wholesome criticisms upon the decadence of popular ideals. The subject of his remarks is certainly a fruitful field for study and investigation on the part of moralists and students of political science. In my opinion, the danger is more in the manner of its accumulation and use than in the wealth itself. While there is vastly more per capita wealth in the country to-day than there ever was before, there is not so great a disparity in the conditions of the people as there was a half century ago. Ever since the dawn of civilization those who were ill to do complained, and in many instances justly, against the thrifty. The difference in conditions is largely in the capacity of the individuals themselves. This is not altogether the case. I would be glad if the great volume of aggregate wealth of the United States were more evenly distributed among the citizens, provided such distribution were the result of economic law and closer equality of capacity. Conditions can be improved by promoting policies that will secure as far as possible equal privileges and opportunities for all the people.

During the last ten years there has been a greater increase in the aggregate wealth of this country than in any other decade of its history, and if this wealth is concentrated in the hands of but few of our citizens, while the great multitude are struggling along in poverty and destitution, it would signify nothing toward the permanent advancement of our civilzation. On the other hand, it would be a serious menace to the public welfare. Unless there has been a corresponding growth in the moral and intellectual lives of the people and a corresponding elevation of the standard of living, this stupendous increase of wealth would surely be of no advantage. But we need only to consult statistics to learn that the increase of the value of farm property has been most gratifying and fairly in proportion to the importance of that first and most important of all industries, agriculture. The savings institutions of the country inform us that the toilers of the land have had a fairly equitable share in this splendid era of prosperity. I do not pretend to say that every citizen has received all he desired or all he deserved, nor, on the other hand, do I claim that some citizens have not accumulated much more than their just deserts, but I do contend that there has been as equitable a distribution of the increase of wealth as has been possible under existing social conditions.

We must bear in mind that when conditions are such that the average man of the country can provide himself and those dependent upon him with the comforts and blessings of life, men of great genius and capacity for the creation and accumulation of wealth will take advantage of those same conditions and amass enormous fortunes. We have no right to complain of wealth honestly and justly accumulated, but there have been altogether too many fortunes made by dishonest and indefensible methods.

It is possible that the mere accumulation of wealth occupies too great a place in the thoughts and purposes of our people. The very end and object of civilization is the elevation of the standard of manhood and womanhood, and wealth, honor, culture, and government itself are only important to the extent that they promote this end. It should be no credit to a man who accumulates money by questionable methods. The pulpit, the school, and the forum should emphasize the doctrine that virtue and honor are above all else and a good character above riches.

There is a general demand throughout the country for the more effective regulation of transportation companies, and this demand is not the offspring of any deep-seated or implacable prejudice against corporate enterprises. The people of the United States have a just appreciation of the importance of transportation companies in economic progress. They are indispensable agencies in our civilization, and there is no sentiment that would in any degree impair their usefulness or impose upon them onerous conditions or unfair burdens, but they must deal justly with the people.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], in his scholarly and philosophical speech on yesterday, denounced the pending bill as communistic in spirit and socialistic in tendency. I can not accept the gentleman's construction of the measure or admit the soundness of his judgment respecting its effect upon the country. The bill is conservative in its provisions and entirely just and fair in its spirit. Corporations are creatures of government; there is no natural or inalienable right in individuals to organize into corporate entities. They are authorized by the Government for the purpose of promoting the welfare of society, and whenever the public welfare demands a limitation of their powers or a regulation of their methods of doing business it is the duty of the Government to impose such limitations and regulations as will protect society against corporate abuse. This is not communism, but it is simply the assertion of the fundamental principle that the welfare of the people is and always must be the paramount consideration in the enactment and enforcement of laws. Industrial socialism I understand to be the ownership by the State of all means of the production of wealth. The proposition to regulate corporations engaged in interstate commerce has no principle analogous to industrial socialism. It means simply that the creatures of the Government shall be made to serve the purposes for which they were created. It means simply the assertion of the superiority of the creator over its creatures.

There is at this time an abiding belief throughout the country that many rates and practices of transportation companies are unjust and unfair. The practice of granting rebates and other advantages to favorite shippers has been, and is, beyond question a common one on the part of all interstate railroad companies. It has done more to suppress honest competition and to promote unlawful trusts and monopolies than any other one factor. There are drastic laws against the practice, but ingenious devices have been invented that successfully evade the laws. Private cars and private terminals have been made use of to grant rebates under the guise of a division of rates for transportation. In many instances railroad companies have agreed with favorite shippers to certain rebates upon shipments, but have charged regular rates on all shipments and entered them regularly upon their books, and at stated periods the shipper would bill a consignment of goods to some point without actually delivering them to the carrier, send the bill of lading to the consignee, and in a short time would, of course, receive notice that the goods had not arrived. He would report the alleged loss to the railroad company and an investigation would be made and no trace of the goods could be found. The company would then request him to make an estimate of the value of the supposed lost goods and he would fix the value at the amount of rebate that would be due him under the agreement, and his claim, after going through the regular process of auditing, would be allowed and a draft drawn in his favor for the amount. The whole business would be fictitious from beginning to end, but the records of the company would be straight and would disclose nothing of the subterfuge resorted to by the parties to evade the antirebate law. When such ingenious schemes are made use of to cheat the law, it is exceedingly difficult to enforce its penalties. Nobody, of course, would know anything about the transaction except the railroad company and the shipper, and the books of neither would disclose anything showing the fictitious and fraudulent character of the transaction.

But, sir, notwithstanding the cunning of the lawbreakers, the present Administration has done more toward enforcing the antirebate and the antitrust laws and bringing conspicuous offenders to justice than any other two Administrations in the history of the Government. One only need run over the last annual report of the Attorney-General to learn of the enormous amount of efficient work that has been done in the last two years to make the laws of the country effective and respected.

While the most prominent feature of the pending bill is that which authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates for transportation where existing rates upon investigation have been found unjust and unreasonable, a rate so fixed will not protect the public against the abuse of the rebate system. It is just as easy to grant rebates by subterfuge and dishonesty against a Government rate as it is against one fixed by a carrier. It seems that we now have all the laws necessary to break up the rebate system, but we must find some more effective means for their enforcement.

The rate problem is one of the most intricate and delicate that the human mind has to deal with. Existing rates in many respects are apparently unequal and unjust, but a careful investigation of conditions upon which they are based will convince any fair mind that many practices which seem indefensible are not only just but are necessary to the proper development of the commerce and industries of the country. This is not true in all cases, because some rates can not be defended on any ground of policy or justice. In most instances rates are not arbitrary, but are fixed in accordance with natural economic law. They are not capricious, but are the result of numerous subtle and intangible forces that are characteristic of economic law. It may be set down as a general proposition that men who construct and operate railroads are prompted by the same selfish motives that prompt men in all other lines of business. Even the practice of granting rebates and concessions to large patrons is a natural one in all lines of private business. Better terms are extended to large customers than to small ones. The great mercantile establishments offer better prices to regular customers who buy large amounts than to intermittent traders who buy small amounts, and no one complains, but the rebate practice in respect to the transportation business is so vitally connected with all lines of trade and commerce that the people feel it more deeply than they do in any other enterprise. If two men are engaged in buying and shipping the same line of products at a given point and the transportation company gives rebates or substantial favors to one, the inevitable result is the other must retire and leave the favored buyer in absolute control of the field, with a complete monopoly of the business. This enables him to impose his own conditions and terms upon the sellers, and they are unable to protect themselves. The viciousness of the rebate system is felt more keenly in the transportation business, and therefore the law has taken notice of it and undertaken to eradicate it.

Section 4 of the original interstate-commerce act provides that it shall be unlawful for a transportation company to charge a greater price for hauling a commodity over a short distance than it charges for hauling the same commodity over a longer distance, the short distance being included in the long, where the circumstances are substantially the same. It was a common practice at the time of the enactment of that law for railroads to charge higher rates for what is known as the "short haul" than the long haul, and it was the aim of section 4 of that statute to prevent that practice. To the ordinary mind the charging of more for hauling a commodity a short distance than for hauling the same commodity a longer distance is unjust and absolutely indefensible; but the Supreme Court of the United States has practically taken all of the virtue out of that section of the law, if it ever had any virtue. The rate of transportation from points on the Great Northern Railroad in Minnesota to Spokane and Seattle illustrates that principle. Spokane is nearly 500 miles nearer St. Paul than is Seattle, but the rate from St. Paul to Spokane is the rate to Seattle and the local rate back to Spokane, although the road runs through Spokane to get to Seattle. The short haul is included in the long, and the property does not go to Seattle and back, but is unloaded at Spokane. The Supreme Court has upheld the Spokane rate, on the ground that it is not unreasonable considered by itself, and the rate to Seattle is abnormally low. Seattle is a competitive point. Several lines of railroad reach it, and there is likewise water competition. If the Spokane rate was applied to commodities shipped to and from Seattle, the result would be that the railroad would not receive any part of that traffic and would receive none of the revenues resulting from it, because it would go by some other route, and the consequence would be that the Spokane rates would have to be still higher.

It may be set down as a general proposition that the expenses of operating and maintaining a railroad, including a reasonable dividend upon the capital invested, must be paid by the receipts, passenger and freight, as a whole, and any freight or passenger traffic that contributes something toward the payment of the expenses of operating and maintaining the road relieves the other traffic of that much of a burden it would otherwise be compelled to carry. Unless the business of a railroad is sufficient to pay its operating expenses and expenses of maintenance and some profit upon the capital the road will cease to be operated. Men do not engage in such great undertakings without the expectation of some profit.

Several years ago the railroad running from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic seaboard fixed a rate upon grain raised west of the Mississippi River at 85 per cent of the Chicago rate from the river to the seaboard, although the distance from the river to the seaboard was 116 per cent of the distance from Chicago to the seaboard. Complaint was made of this practice by the Chicago Board of Trade, but it was justified on the ground that there was competition for the grain west of the river. The railroads running to Gulf ports were competing with railroads running to the Atlantic ports and it was necessary for the roads running to the East to lower the rates to 85 per cent of the Chicago rate in order to secure any portion of the competitive traffic. If the Chicago rate had been lowered correspondingly the roads would have been deprived of any profit upon their capital, and if the roads had been compelled to charge the Chicago rate for grain west of the river they would have lost much of that traffic to the Gulf roads, and while it did not pay its relative share of the cost of running the roads it paid some portion of the fixed and continuous expenses which would otherwise have been charged against Chicago traffic and other traffic at intermediate points. The roads charged this low rate for Mississippi River traffic because they could not get any more for it. It was all the traffic would bear.

Several years ago a case arose where commodities brought from foreign countries were shipped from New Orleans to San Francisco by way of the Texas and Pacific Railroad and its western connections at $1.07 per hundred, when commodities of the same kind exactly, shipped from New Orleans over the same road and, perhaps, on the same train to the same destination, were charged $3.70 per hundred. Complaint was made of this practice as an unjust discrimination against commodities produced in the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, justified the discrimination because there was water competition between European ports and San Francisco. The railroad company showed that unless it were permitted to haul the foreign goods from New Orleans to San Francisco at $1.07 a hundred they would be sent by an all-water route by way of Cape Horn or by way of the Isthmus of Panama and the company would be deprived of all revenue resulting from their shipment. It was shown that the rate charged domestic goods from New Orleans to San Francisco considered by itself was a reasonable rate, and that the rate charged foreign goods between those points was abnormally low, yet it contributed somewhat toward paying the fixed charges and expenses of operating and maintaining the railroad. If this freight were not hauled other freight on that line would have had to bear the entire burden of that expense.

Then the question of back loading is one that enters vitally into the equation of railroad rates. When the Great Northern road was completed from St. Paul and Duluth to the Pacific seaboard large quantities of grain and other commodities were shipped to the West to be taken to the Orient. There was comparatively little paying freight that could be brought from the Pacific seaboard to St. Paul and Duluth, but the managers of that road fixed a rate upon lumber so low that it induced men to go into the lumber business and enabled them to ship large quantities of lumber from Washington and Oregon to the Mississippi Valley profitably. The rates upon the lumber were excessively low, and if the same rates had been fixed for transportation to the West upon that road it would have gone into bankruptcy inside of six months. If that road had not hauled lumber from the Pacific coast to the East at such extremely low rates, its cars would have gone back empty. That traffic did not pay its relative share of the cost of operation and maintenance of the road, but it contributed something toward the payment of that cost and thereby relieved other freights of that much of the burden. It was remunerative to that extent and in that sense. Whatever was received from it was almost entire profit, because the cars had to be taken back anyway.

Railroads running from the North Atlantic seaboard to Memphis fixed a rate upon cotton from Memphis to New York and Boston below the rate from Memphis to the Carolinas, although the distance to the latter was much less. The roads running to the Carolinas complained to the Interstate Commerce Commission of the low rates fixed by the North Atlantic railroads, and an investigation showed that large quantities of merchandise were shipped from New York and Boston to Memphis and vicinity, and there was comparatively little freight to be hauled back, but by fixing exceptionally low rates on cotton the roads were able to run their cars back laden; and while the cotton thus shipped did not pay its relative share of the expenses of operating and maintaining the road, it contributed something toward that end and thereby relieved the other freight shipped by the road of that much of the burden, and the practice was upheld.

Much has been said in the discussion of the rate problem about basing rates upon the principle of cost of service—a thing that all students of the question must agree to be impracticable. It is sometimes difficult to know when a railroad rate is remunerative and when it is not. It must be borne in mind that the great bulk of the expenses of operating and maintaining railroads is a fixed burden. Locomotives and cars must be bought, equipped, manned, and operated. The roadbed must be kept in repair, buildings must be kept in shape, taxes must be paid. All of these expenses must be incurred before the road is in shape to earn any money at all, and the entire receipts of the road from all of its business must pay all of this expense and in addition a fair profit upon the capital invested. At least 75 per cent of all the freights hauled in this country does not pay its relative share of the cost of operation and maintenance and dividend upon capital, but this large portion of the freights pay a substantial part of the expense of operation and maintenance. If a railroad was not allowed to carry freight that paid only a portion of its relative share of the expense of operating and maintaining the road, it would be impossible to conduct many of the great lines of railroad in this country that are fairly profitable to-day. A rate is remunerative if it pays anything above what may be termed "the out-of-pocket cost" of carrying a commodity; that is, the additional cost of service on account of hauling that particular freight. If it contributes anything above that particular cost toward the paying of the expense of operation and maintenance, it is remunerative, and it may be put down as a proposition that can not be gainsaid that where railroad companies haul freight that does not pay its relative share of the cost of operation and maintenance it is because they can not get more for the transportation of that class of freights.

The whole system of freight classification is based upon that identical principle. Originally railroads were crude and transportation over them was expensive and only property of high value and small bulk was able to pay the freight charges. Gradually, as railroading developed and it became known that the fixed charges for operation and maintenance had to be borne continuously, it was discovered that goods of larger bulk and less value could be profitably hauled if they contributed even a small amount over and above the additional cost of the service on account of hauling the particular goods. That transportation would be profitable if it contributed even a small amount toward paying the fixed expenses of the railroad. Therefore the second-class freight was hauled at low but remunerative rates. It was necessary to make very low rates in order that this class of freights could be transported over the railroads at all. As railroads still further extended and increased in efficiency and the cost of transportation relatively lessened, still more bulky and less valued freights were handled at still lower rates, contributing something toward the payment of the annual expenses of operating and maintaining the roads, and in this way, by a process of evolution as natural as it was beneficial, the classification of freights came about. Freights of the fourth, fifth, and sixth class to-day pay much less than their relative share of the expenses of transportation, but they contribute something and thereby relieve freights of the first, second, and third class of that burden. If an attempt were made to equalize freight rates and base them upon the cost of service, a great deal of the lower-class freights would be shut out altogether and the expense of the high-class freights would be greatly increased; and the efficiency of railroads would be materially lowered. It costs as much to haul a car of fifth-class freight a thousand miles as it does a car of first-class freight, but the rate is much less because the traffic will not bear more.

I have made these observations upon the theory and philosophy of rate making, with a view of explaining many of the anomalous things that appear in existing rates throughout the country. Things that seem to be arbitrary and indefensible are easily understood when the philosophy of rate making and classification is considered. Every pound of freight hauled by a railroad that contributes something toward the payment of the cost of operation and maintnance of the road relieves other freights of that much of the burden and is, therefore, beneficial to them, provided always that these freights could not be hauled at a higher and more equitable rate. The country is protected against inordinately low rates by the selfish interests of railroad owners. As I said a moment ago, it may be set down as a fundamental and a trustworthy proposition that railroad companies carry freights at rates below their relative cost only when they are unable to get higher rates for that class of freights. They charge all the traffic will bear.

Much is said in the discussion of this important question respecting what is known as differentials—port differentials and sectional differentials. A differential is a concession made in rates to one port or locality above others, for the purpose of either equalizing port differences or equalizing differences in facilities for transportation, thus putting the two places upon terms of equality. A number of years ago New York City was the great trading center of the Atlantic seaboard. It had transportation advantages and port facilities enjoyed by no other city in America, and it practically monopolized all of the export and import trade of the country. Its merchants and jobbers levied tolls upon everything that came into and went out of the country. When the Pennsylvania Railroad, running from Philadelphia, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, running from Baltimore, arranged connections to Chicago, a rate war was opened up between those two roads on the one side and the New York Central and its western connections on the other. The Pennsylvania road insisted upon reducing freights in order that a portion of the business of the great Northwest should be transacted by Philadelphia merchants and jobbers. The Baltimore and Ohio road insisted that a portion of that business should be transacted by the Baltimore merchants and jobbers, and the rate war was continued for several years until finally terms were reached by which the New York Central and its western connections conceded differentials in favor of Philadelphia and Baltimore. These differentials were in the form of lower rates on freight from Chicago to Philadelphia and Baltimore than were given to New York, and they were sufficient to overcome the transportation and port advantages New York had over the other ports. New York merchants complained bitterly about the arrangement and denounced it as unfair; that the metropolis was deprived of the natural advantages that belonged to it on account of its superior location. But the result was to put the merchants of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore upon an absolute equality in so far as rates and facilities for transportation were concerned, and the contest for commercial supremacy among them was a battle of genius and enterprise. The competition became so sharp in those centers of commerce that every penny of extra cost in the handling and transportation of grain and produce from the West was eliminated, and to-day the difference between the farm price of grains and the Liverpool price is less than one-half what it was thirty years ago.

There has been a general decline in the price of food products throughout the world during the last thirty years; but our western farmers have suffered comparatively little from that decline because of the increasing advantages that they have had in the cost of transporting their crops to the European markets. It does not cost half as much to-day to ship a bushel of wheat from the Dakotas to Liverpool as it did thirty years ago, and this result was brought about very largely through the port differentials that were arranged in the rate war between New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. The American farmer in the West has prospered beyond parallel, largely because of the great advantages he has in transportation. Freight rates in this country, taken as a whole, by the ton-mile are less than half the average rates in Europe. It is true that the hauls average longer in the United States than in Europe, and the efficiency of American railroads is far superior to that of the European railroads; therefore the rates ought to be lower.

As illustrating the principle of differentials, the Pacific coast, the Gulf coast, and the Atlantic coast are now competitors for farm products grown in a large area in the Middle West. In this competitive area exceptionally low prices of transportation are afforded, and as a result of rate contests differentials have been granted to the Atlantic seaboard, and in some instances to the Pacific seaboard, in their contest with the Gulf ports. There can be no question that these differentials have been greatly beneficial to the western farmer, and rates in this country between the great centers of population and trade are as low as they can be reasonably expected.

But the modern tendency of railroads is toward consolidation into gigantic systems, and the inevitable result of such consolidation is the elimination of that competition which has done so much toward the promotion of the welfare of the people of the whole country. If competition between the great interstate transportation companies ceases to exist, I deem it to be absolutely necessary for the Federal Government to assert its power to protect producers and shippers against exorbitant charges. If competition is to be eliminated, Government regulation and limited control must take its place. I concede that great advantages come from consolidation of railroad systems in the continuity of shipment and voyage, in the increase of comfort, convenience, and general facilities; but as long as railroads are operated solely for the purpose of making money for their owners the producers of the country must have some protection against extortionate charges and unjust practices.

The chief sufferers under present conditions are not the shippers in the great centers of trade, but producers and shippers in the numerous intermediate points, where there is but one line of railroad—points where there is absolutely no competition—and for these I am concerned particularly. There is a practice, by railroads chiefly in the Southern States, of what is called the "basing-point system." In view of the condition of development of railroad transportation in those States it may be that that practice is not an unjust one. It is this: Railroads at competitive points give exceptionally low rates, lower than they do to intermediate points. Take, for instance, the city of Atlanta, Ga. That city is a basing point, or a competitive point—made so not as a matter of choice by the railroads, but to meet fixed economic conditions. The result is that rates from New York City to Atlanta are considerably lower over the same line of road than rates to intermediate points within a couple of hundred miles of Atlanta. The rate from New York to a point a hundred miles north of Atlanta is the rate to Atlanta and the local rate back. Serious complaint is made of this system, and it is denounced as unjust and unreasonable, but there is competition in transportation from the city of New York to the city of Atlanta, and by making Atlanta a basing point there is a regular traffic by carload and even by trainload consignments of goods between New York and Atlanta. The railroads can make more money by sending regular shipments in carload lots to Atlanta at lower rates than they could by shipping parts of cars intermittently to intervening points at higher rates.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, that is a very interesting question, and I would be glad if the gentleman would enlighten me a little bit upon it. He says they have made Atlanta, Ga., a basing point. If they can make Atlanta, Ga., a basing point, can not they unmake it as a basing point and make a basing point at some other place—out in the woods? I should be glad if the gentleman would explain if there is anything in this bill to regulate or prevent that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is nothing in this bill that will prevent a man from committing suicide if he is inclined to do it. The gentleman must keep in mind that it is the object of railroad companies to develop traffic, and "basing points" in a large measure select themselves—that is, industrial and commercial conditions control in their selection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the gentleman said that they made Atlanta a basing point. Why didn't they make Nashville or Chattanooga a basing point?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. When I said they had made Atlanta a basing point I meant that its geographical situation, the character of the surrounding country, and the fact of competition pointed it out as a place where traffic could be developed and a natural basing point. Locations so situated as to afford a large amount of traffic may be made successful basing points. A railroad can not secure traffic at a point where there is none and none can be developed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They arbitrarily made that city a basing point. Does the gentleman believe that any railroad should have the right to "make" or "break" a city, "make" or "break" a firm or individual or corporation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not care to go into a discussion of that question, because I do not concede the premises upon which the gentleman bases his assumption. Basing points are not the result of arbitrary action by railroad companies, but they come from economic considerations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One question further: Railroads, unless we have a commission to regulate them, can make or break cities or persons, and isn't that one of the reasons why the gentleman is for this rate-making commission?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I can not say that is the principal reason for my support of the bill. In regard to many things the public is fully protected by the self-interest of railroad companies. We can depend upon the fact that a railroad company will do nothing to injure its own business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think I shall be able to show the gentleman cases where cities have made complaints of that sort.

Mr. MANN. And I think I could show cases where cities have made no such complaint. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They have practically destroyed one little town or city to build up another.

Mr. MANN. Every city makes that complaint.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is claimed that the basing-point system tends toward centralizing trade. The system is justified by railroad-rate experts on the ground that it decentralizes trade. It is claimed that if railroad rates were based on the mileage plan there would be no distributing centers in the interior; that seaboard merchants and jobbers would supply all of the retail establishments throughout the country, but by establishing basing points wholesale and jobbing houses are located at those points to supply the retail trade in territory tributary to them, and as a result such cities as Atlanta, Memphis, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Paul, Minneapolis, and others are pointed to.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion as to the distinction, if any, between the expression "reasonable" and "fairly remunerative."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I do not think there is any distinction in law between a reasonable rate and a fairly remunerative rate.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman will observe that section 15, as amended, provides that the rate shall be "reasonable, just, and fairly remunerative."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to find out just as nearly as I can the exact meaning of that language. There certainly must have been some difference intended between the expressions or they would not have used both.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have not given the bill in detail that critical study which I should have given it, but the terms "reasonable rate" and "fairly remunerative rate" in my opinion are substantially equivalent terms. A railroad company may not charge above a fairly remunerative or reasonable rate, but in determining what that rate is it must be kept in mind that rates as a whole must pay the expenses of the road as a whole, and a rate may be fairly remunerative which pays a small part of its relative share of the general expenses of the road and that rate may be reasonable if it is "all the traffic will bear."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to get the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana, because he is a very good lawyer, upon another proposition. Suppose this Commission should substitute for a rate that is found to be unreasonable and unjust another rate that is not confiscatory but not particularly remunerative. Could the court enjoin that order of the Commission from going into effect?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My judgment is the courts could only enjoin rates that are regarded as confiscatory. Rate making is legislation and the question of the reasonableness of a rate is a legislative and not a judicial question. If the rate is so low as to violate the constitutional safeguards to property, of course the courts may prevent its enforcement.

Mr. PALMER. Then what right has Congress to depute any such power to any commission?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a question for the courts to decide. I think rate making is a legislative function and the discretion involved is generally legislative. The only question for the courts in passing upon the validity of a legislative act is whether the act is within the constitutional power of the legislative body. Rates fixed by law must be remunerative—that is, they must yield some profit on the capital invested—or they will be confiscatory. The profit must be substantial and not merely nominal, but whether a profit of 3 or 4 or 6 per cent on the investment is a reasonable one is for the legislature to determine and not the courts.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Another question. Let me ask the gentleman this: This bill provides a penalty of $5,000 per day for failing to obey this order. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion as to whether that is a valid provision of law under the fifth amendment, I think it is, to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not see why it is not. I see no reason why Congress can not impose a penalty upon law-breakers, a progressive and continuing penalty, if it sees fit, making each particular violation of law on each day's continuation a separate crime.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I just wanted to get the gentleman's opinion about that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But producers and buyers of commodities at small centers on lines of single railroads are at a great disadvantage. They are compelled to accept without question the rates fixed by the railroad companies, and often those rates are extortionate, but under the power conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by this bill relief will be brought to that great class of people who are in much need of it. In addition to the imposition of extortionate rates upon the producers and traders at intermediate stations they are discriminated against in the way of facilities. At those periods of the year when there is a general crop movement throughout the country the railroad companies naturally employ all of their cars in shipping products from competitive points. They are interested in securing all of the grain at those points possible while it can be secured, for they know that at intermediate stations, where there is no competition, the products must be shipped over their respective roads or not be shipped at all, and the result is that the grain buyers of the small communities are compelled to wait for weeks and sometimes months to secure cars for shipment, when the producers and shippers at competitive points are regularly and promptly supplied.

Grain buyers at these intermediate communities are compelled to exact a larger margin of profit from the producers to protect them against possible fluctuations in the market than they would if they could depend upon facilities of transportation in reasonable time to get it into the markets. These people are the chief sufferers under the present system, and they are the people who are entitled to protection. They are the farmers and local grain buyers of the country, who perform their duties to the Government patriotically and uncomplainingly. They are the bone and sinew of the Government. They are the mainstay of society, and under existing conditions their well-being is utterly dependent upon the sense of justice and fairness of railroad companies.

This bill asserts in emphatic terms the doctrine that this is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people; that whenever it becomes necessary to promote the welfare of the people the Government will unhesitatingly assert its power of control over transportation companies. The moral effect of this measure will be tremendous. Railroad companies will feel it to their interest to conduct their affairs in such a way as to show to the public the entire justice of their methods.

The people ask railroad companies and other corporations simply to obey the law. They are willing that railroads should charge rates sufficiently high to pay them for the expenses of operation and maintenance and allow a reasonable compensation upon their actual capital invested. They do object, however, to being compelled to pay dividends upon large amounts of fictitious stock. The practice of watering stock is one of the most reprehensible in modern industry, and the pending bill provides additional means to compel publicity on the part of railroad companies, so the country may know more about the relation of assets and capitalization. With these safeguards to prevent the overcapitalization of railroad properties, and with the laws we have upon the statute books to prevent rebates and unfair discriminations in favor of favorite shippers, and the power in the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect helpless producers and shippers where there is no competition against burdensome and unjust exactions, it seems that commerce ought to be greatly facilitated. This bill is evolutional in its character, and if experience shall demonstrate that other safeguards should be incorporated into the law no doubt Congress will readily respond to the needs of the country and adopt such additional measures as will fully secure to the public the protection to which it is justly entitled. Whether more legislation along this line will be required in the future depends wholly upon the conduct of railroad corporations themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELLIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELLIS] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak of waterway development as a means of railway rate regulation. This is a little out of the current of present debate but entirely germane to the subject under consideration. I would, however, first signify my approval of the pending measure by some general observations of its policy and general features. I do not accord my support to the bill because I believe it to be especially revolutionary, but rather because I believe it to be distinctly salutary. I do not believe that this Hepburn bill if enacted into law will, as predicted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], have the effect to wreck present transportation systems. I do not expect it to unsettle values or overturn the legitimate order in railway enterprise and operations in this country; but I do believe, Mr. Chairman, that if it become a law, this measure will cure many ills, correct real abuses, remedy manifest wrongs, supply deficiencies, restore confidence, and immensely promote the common weal.

This is in its spirit and temper a conservative measure. It is not a radical one. That is what commends the bill to my mind. The enactment of a law on the subject of railway traffic regulation has been imposed as a special duty, a special order, on this Congress. The President, however, in the same utterances which proclaimed the demand for a measure, emphasized by reiteration the desirability that it be a safe, sane, and sober measure. Listen to some of the things the President has said on this subject in his message to this Congress:

> I am well aware of the difficulties of the legislation that I am suggesting and of the need of temperate and cautious action in securing it. I should emphatically protest against improperly radical or hasty action.
> I do not believe in the Government interfering with private business more than is necessary. I do not believe in the Government undertaking any work which can with propriety be left in private hands.
> Let me most earnestly say that these recommendations are not made in any spirit of hostility to the railroads. On ethical grounds, on grounds of right, such hostility would be intolerable; that such hostility would tell against the welfare not merely of some few rich men, but of a multitude of small investors, a multitude of railway employees, wage-workers; and most severely against the interest of the public as a whole.
> I ask this legislation not only in the interest of the public but in the interest of the honest railroad man and the honest shipper alike, for it is they who are chiefly jeoparded by the practices of their dishonest competitors. This legislation should be enacted in a spirit as remote as possible from hysteria and rancor.

This bill meets the requirements, responds to the specifications. These desires of the Chief Executive have manifestly been carried into the deliberation of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The report of that committee denotes that. This is what they say:

> No member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce believes that the provisions of this bill will be satisfactory to all persons who may be affected by it, nor that it will be satisfactory even to those who desire legislation upon the lines of the bill. But it must be remembered that the bill involves great questions, involving thousands of millions of property and interests that are measured by hundreds of millions of dollars every year, and all sections of the country, and that complete harmony of sentiment upon any measure involving so much is not to be expected. Such harmony belongs to the realm of the impossible. We can only say that from the divergent views entertained by us, and that have been urged upon us during protracted hearings, we have done the best we could to provide a measure that we think will give at least very considerable relief from evils that are recognized to be many and grievous.

These are good words. They reflect high thinking and denote a plane of action above partisanship, above narrowness, above any prejudice against American enterprises and industrial operations, because they are big, above envy or hatred of power, high above all these things, on an exalted level of true patriotism and real statesmanship. [Applause.] So the bill proceeds from the committee under the momentum of a unanimous report. Here is surely a suggestion of millennial glory. There is assurance enough in this unanimous verdict of these distinguished Members of this House to prompt one to vote for the bill even if time or occasion to study its provisions were not afforded. I am glad to take this occasion to throw these bouquets. I believe this feature of this legislation can not be too highly commended. [Applause.]

I esteem it of the utmost importance, Mr. Chairman, that the policy of this measure be correctly interpreted. I was much instructed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] in his eloquent speech in opposition to this measure. It was a courageous effort. For myself, I did not concur in many of his conclusions, but I shall be very sorry if his remarks be not widely published and widely read. If the gentleman were but willing to grant the expediency of some measure of governmental intervention in the regulation of the carriage and of the carriers of commerce, then his argument would be most valuable as a plea for a wise, temperate, and conservative exercise of such power. The learned gentleman proceeded from a false premise. He reads into this measure an administrative purpose which does not properly find lodgment there. He will presently learn that the views and aims of the prompters and promoters of this legislation are not so much at variance with his own as he now supposes. I think the gentleman's contentions may properly be interpreted to be these: That the flow of the currents of commerce should be left, in the main, to the control of natural causes; that the community of vital, permanent interests between the carriers of commodities and the producers of commodities may be depended upon to evolve proper conditions of transportation; that the natural laws which inhere in these mutual interests and spring from them are better and safer for all concerned, than would be mere arbitrary directions, conceived and imposed from without the pale of those interests. But in all this, the President who has urged this legislation, the committee who have reported the bill, the Members of the House who will vote for its passage, and those people everywhere who have thought most wisely upon the subject will, I believe, cheerfully accord.

I think I can go even further. I think I can safely say to the gentleman, and to those whose attitude he voices here, that the American people are not now demanding this legislation because they believe that the railroads of the country should be prevented from exercising, within the widest range of reasonable limitations, the rights which are born of the necessities of their business; nor are the shippers demanding this legislation because they are greatly dissatisfied with the general rules, tests, and standards which the railroads of the country have set up—have in a measure formulated into a sort of code—and are now promulgating and contending for as properly determinative of rates between points and localities. In all the agitation of this great question little has been heard from the people—from individual shippers, from aggrieved classes of shippers or communities—in way of special complaint about "the basing-point rule." From interested sources there has arisen comparatively little complaint of the "cost of service" or the "return-haul" principles of computation; little even of that rule, which seems in its statement harsh and confiscatory, that the charge should be "what the traffic will bear." In other words, the quarrel is not with the railroads, as common carriers, because of unfairness of the laws which they themselves have enacted or invoked to govern and control traffic. But the people are complaining, and have long complained bitterly, of railroad management in this country. Twenty years ago these complaints came up to the Congress and were given a hearing. Committees formulated these grievances and found them to be justified by the facts. Permit me to read a brief summary of one of those committee reports:

The railroad companies do not realize, as they should, the fact that they sustain a different relation to the public from persons engaged in ordinary business enterprises. Railroad companies are not disposed to regard themselves as holding "a public office and bound to the public," as expressed in the ancient law. They do not deal with all citizens alike. They discriminate between persons and places. By secret special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and concessions, they foster monopoly, enrich favored shippers, and prevent free competition in many lines of trade in which the item of transportation is an important factor.

That was a true bill twenty years ago. The bill of particulars is discriminatingly exact, and it is worth while to mention that it emanated from the other end of the Capitol. It is a true bill to-day. Some new devices have appeared and some refinements of the art of false pretense, but no change is visible in the character or methods of the wrongdoing. It will be observed that the offenses complained of consist in this fact: That the railroads do not obey their own laws; do not keep faith with people with respect to them. It is to the departure from these railroad-made rules, to the evasion of them, to the fact that they are not, in practice, interpreted fairly or applied squarely, that the people address their chief complaints. Now, the point I would make is that it is not the policy of this legislation to interfere with the railroads in the exercise of those larger powers, those essential rights of which the two opponents of the bill have spoken. The policy is rather to deal with abuses in the exercise of those powers and rights. It is to impress and enforce the familiar doctrine that before the law—including the law governing the duty of common carriers—all persons must stand on an equality; that the concession to the most favored shipper must be the concession and the law for all shippers who are in substantially the same situation; that the treatment of the most favored community must be the law for all like-situated and like-conditioned communities. [Applause.]

Now, a word as to the delegation of power in this bill. There is such delegation. It is a kind of legislative-administrative power with which neither the people nor the courts are unfamiliar. It is closely akin to the power which is used in the assessment, equalization, and collection of taxes, the States through and the country over. The exercise of this power begins with an abuse and ends with the correction of that abuse. It will be difficult to evade. The scope of application is wide. It will drive through fraud and pretense, whatever the shape it may put on. But it will protect the honest manager of a railroad against managers of the other sort. When an abuse of trust is located and ascertained, then power is reposed in an arm that may reach to the spot and apply the corrective force at the very point of resistance. The railroads ought not to complain of that. To do so is to put themselves in a very bad light before the American people. No upright railroad man will contend that wrongs should not be righted.

In practice this law will be neither radical nor oppressive. The very opposite interpretation is the true one. Lines and limitations are so clearly defined, the authors of the measure have refrained so entirely from crossing doubtful boundaries, that there can be in the measure nothing but assurance that a governmental policy of utmost caution and wisest conservatism is to be pursued in this great matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to come straight to the subject which has brought me into this debate. The development of their great waterways is a matter of such paramount importance to the American people, that whenever the state of the Union is the order a discussion of the subject is surely germane. But we are discussing freight-rate regulation. To talk of waterway improvement is but to speak of another way in which the Government may take a hand and does take a hand in rate regulation. This other way is under an entirely different grant or lodgment of power. It is a way wherein absolutely no one has ever questioned the right of the Government to act and no sane man has ever questioned the expediency of governmental action. It is the most effective regulation of all. It is that regulation which, employing natural instrumentalities respecting natural conditions and advantages, really regulates when more artificial methods fail. I wish to refer again to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In his argument he drew freely on the experience of Germany. He recalled that Germany has tried every method of railway rate regulation—has tried the policy of governmental indifference, advocated by the opponents of the pending bill; has tried government supervision, and, finally, has tried and is trying government ownership. None of these methods have been satisfactory, and the wise statesmen of that progressive country have begun the task of rate regulation by a systematic development of national waterways. They are developing a grand waterway system. Two great rivers—the Elbe and the Rhine—constitute the main arteries. Last year Germany voted ten millions to build a canal from Berlin to Stettin, 100 miles apart, although already connected by a railroad with abundant facilities for transportation; and now, that Berlin may reach that point, they are building a canal to cost ten millions more. Germany's experience should be valuable. We are not only very likely to have a struggle with Germany to retain a place in her home markets, but we have already entered upon a race of trade competition with her for the markets of the world. In this competition water transportation must play the leading part. Not alone water transportation to and from our borders, which will call for improvement of our seaports and harbors, but water transportation, as well, from our deep interior sections, which will render the development of our rivers and canals of transcendent importance. Against miles of German rivers and German canals must be counted scores and hundreds of miles of American rivers and American canals. [Applause.]

I want to bring this right home to us. Permit me to refer to the situation in my own district—not that I want to urge a purely local problem at this time. I would only so refer by way of illustration. The situation there is more familiar to me, and it is typical of situations in scores of other districts and other sections in all parts of our common country.

I am from Missouri. Missouri is the Germany for which I stand in this river-improvement business. The Rhine of my Germany is the Missouri River, and the Cologne on my Rhine is Kansas City. [Applause.] Located there, and growing into the industrial and commercial capital of an area big enough and rich enough for an empire, that progressive young city is watching with keenest interest the great isthmian canal project and is facing a transportation problem. Wrapped up in the future of that metropolis, which is my home, is the fate of a magnificent agriculture. The city as a center, describe a circle with a radius of 200 miles, and when the fertile acres so described shall respond to full cultivation there can be no want anywhere at home and no famines abroad, unless the splendid product shall be left to perish where it grows for want of transportation. [Applause.] The fuel supply of that great area—coal, gas, oil—is fairly exhaustless, and the factories in every town would multiply if only upon this one question of freight rates and freight facilities assurance might be given.

For Kansas City, for all that it represents, Congress can not rightly solve this problem of transportation except it make the Missouri River really navigable and keep it so to the sea. Adopt the German policy, use the German foresight, open this waterway for the people of that great country of Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Missouri, and railway rates will be regulated and will stay regulated. Then for a farmer to have his products or a manufacturer to have his commodities at Kansas City, is to have them at New Orleans, New York, Liverpool, on the Mediterranean, in the ports of South America, in Hongkong, and the Orient. He will be in the markets of the world. He will hold the key to magnificent trade opportunities. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. ELLIS. Very gladly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the gentleman will pardon the interruption, but I would like to inquire whether he can give any figures on the probable investment which the Government would need to make to open the Missouri to navigation so that it might be used in conjunction with the Mississippi as a waterway to the Gulf of Mexico?

Mr. ELLIS. I am very glad the gentleman asked the question; I would be even more glad if I were better able to answer it. So little, Mr. Chairman, has ever been done to improve the navigable condition of the Missouri, and so nearly nothing in late years, that the estimate asked by the gentleman from Kansas is wanting. The report of the Chief of Engineers last year shows that no project for the improvement of the river as a whole has ever been adopted; that since 1884 there has been spent on the whole stretch of river below Sioux City about seven millions. Everybody who knows anything about the matter knows that a comparatively insignificant part of that sum was really spent for the permanent improvement of the river. There is a grim significance in the fact that large sums were spent in the preservation of railway rights of way along its banks. But the engineers tell us in that report that by these expenditures—even though made without a definite, comprehensive plan—it has been demonstrated that the river may be made a channel of commerce. They say it is practicable. A comparatively small aggregate spent systematically from year to year would do the work.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. One more question. Should this work be undertaken and done by the General Government alone or through cooperation with the States most interested?

Mr. ELLIS. By the General Government, unmistakably. These rivers are the highways of the American people. The States can not control them. The benefits flowing from their use can not be circumscribed; they do not stop at State lines. I have tried to make that point; I hope I have succeeded.

But, Mr. Chairman, this consummation would have another effect besides this relation to remote and foreign markets. Recur, for illustration, to the Mississippi Valley. When the rivers of that great valley—the Ohio, the Mississippi, the Missouri, and their tributaries—which are navigable on the maps, by expert tests and standards, shall be navigable in fact; when the canal from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi and the other canals which are even now contemplated shall be completed, as they will be some time, railway rates upon all the lines, in all directions, in that great interior section will have been regulated as no law on any statute book can ever regulate them. Transportation rates for our domestic commerce, much the most important of all, will have been leveled along all lines; and all, moreover, will have been wrought without substantial injury or real injustice to the railroads themselves. I received only this morning a copy of a paper published at Baltimore, the Manufacturers' Record. It contains an able editorial urging the "fullest development" of our river systems concurrently with the construction of the Panama Canal.

Such a development—

Says the article—

would not in any sense militate against the railroads. It is true that it would be a regulator of freight rates, and might be a far better regulator than Congress can ever be, but it would so vastly expand the trade and traffic of this country that our railroads would still continue, as they are at present, to be taxed beyond their ability to handle traffic. We would see throughout the country an expansion somewhat similar to that which has followed the development of the harbors and the Sault Ste. Marie Canal on the Lakes.

To obtain this indirect benefit it is not necessary that the railroads shall be much affected in the volume of their business. It is only necessary that the two systems of transportation may exist together. Waterways can not be monopolized by trusts or combines. The whole tendency of water transportation is to destroy trusts and stimulate competition.

Mr. Chairman, we need the regulation of freight rates which will be secured in this bill; we need the regulation which will come through a development of our waterways. The two methods will work in perfect harmony. We need these waterways in our business. How are we to have them? By pursuing the policy which has obtained heretofore and appropriating on the average less than twenty millions a year? At this rate we can not touch the fringes of the proposition. Projects which bear the stamp of approval now aggregate fully $400,000,000. The present attitude of the Congress toward this most urgent public work practically requires at the hands of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that they keep the aggregate appropriation so low as to affect with discouragement every project everywhere. This niggardly policy does not emanate, I am happy to be able to say, from the committee of this House; it has been imposed upon that committee. It is not meet that interest here in this important class of public work shall have to be awakened by the clamor of local projects. A new policy should be inaugurated—a national policy—a determined purpose broad enough and strong enough to take up these local projects and carry them into a comprehensive system of waterway improvement. More money should be invested—fifty millions a year—until we catch up with the demands that are now upon us. The occasion of this discussion is a fit time to begin in earnest the consideration of this matter, which will so much affect our national prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HOGG].

Mr HOGG. Mr. Chairman, when I became a Member of this House I promised myself that I would never ask the indulgence of the House to listen to me unless I thought I had something to say and ought to say it. It may be that you will conclude that I have violated my own limitations. If so, I can only say that I have not trespassed perhaps more than others who have gone before me in the discussion of this measure. [Laughter.]

I understand it is claimed by the sponsors of this bill that it is an Administration measure. It was claimed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL] upon yesterday that it was a Democratic measure; and I trust that there are none here, or in the country at large, who will conclude that the latter statement necessarily results from the former. [Laughter.] However this may be, it is understood that this measure—that has the unusual experience of having the unanimous indorsement of the committee, both Democratic and Republican—has been practically formulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and is said to have the favor of the President.

These considerations, together with the many wise provisions contained in the bill, will lead us, no doubt, to give it our earnest support, although many of us may, and no doubt do, question some of its provisions.

There are but few phases of this question that I care to call to the attention of the committee, although the discussion has taken a very wide range indeed, and along lines, I am sure, concerning which our knowledge, to the say the least, is extremely limited. That this is so necessarily arises from the vast and complex problems that are connected with the transportation question. When we stop to consider the tremendous impetus that has been received along every avenue of industrial activity, through the development of the railway, the ease and rapidity of communication between different parts of the country, and the distribution of the products of every portion to every other portion of our great domain, it ought at least to compel thoughtful action upon our part before we attempt to disturb the equilibrium of so vast a structure.

But however vexing the problem may be, it must be met resolutely and with a determination to so legislate as to bring good and not ill to those interests most vitally concerned upon the one side and upon the other. It is hard to conceive that there is any person who is not interested in some degree in this solution.

I have been much interested and instructed in the statements made here and elsewhere as to the evils that have grown up in the management of the railways of the country. That they are many and far-reaching is admitted by all. That the benefits enjoyed from the operation of these vast systems are past calculation ought, I think, also to be admitted, and out of this mass of good and evil it should be our care to evolve some sort of adjustment that will prevent the wrong and secure that fair, just, and reasonable conduct of affairs in connection with the management of the railways as will bring a benefit to the people as well as to the railways. A very considerable agitation has been carried on for the past thirty years concerning the proper and legitimate control of transportation companies. In many of the States legislation has been had, more or less stringent and with varying results, but throughout it all a steady advance until, in most of the States having legislation upon the subject, a comparatively satisfactory conclusion has been arrived at upon the subject. So very general had been the purpose to secure some satisfactory settlement of this question, and the several States being limited in the scope of their action to transportation wholly within the State, and this being upon the whole but a limited portion of the great bulk of the business carried on by the transportation companies, it soon became evident if any lasting good was to be accomplished it would become necessary for the General Government to take up the matter in order that the traffic between the States and foreign countries might be regulated in order to secure the proper treatment of the whole subject.

In 1887 Congress, to meet this condition, passed what is known as the "Interstate Commerce Act," which, with a few amendments, the most important of which is the "Elkins Act," has remained in force ever since, but which under more recent conditions has been found to be inadequate to cope with the rapid developments of railway traffic.

The Interstate Commerce Commission was under that act constituted as an administrative board to consider any complaints that might be preferred against any of the interstate carriers touching their practices, both as to methods and rates. It must be acknowledged that this Commission, although presumably with power to correct the evils complained of, have so far been unable to accomplish much, owing to the lack of power to enforce their orders. This weakness in the original act is now sought to be overcome by the additional legislation now contained in the bill before us for consideration. It will be observed that this bill undertakes, in the first place, to extend the term "railroad" so as to include bridges and ferries, roads operated under contract, switches, tracks, terminal facilities of every kind, as well as depots, yards, and grounds. The term "transportation" has also been enlarged so as to include all instrumentalities and facilities of carriage and all services performed in connection with the handling of property.

We now come to the portion of the bill which seeks to enforce the doing of certain things and the refraining from doing certain things. We find:

First. It shall be the duty of the carrier to furnish transportation upon reasonable request.

Second. That all charges shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable charge is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

Third. The carrier shall keep open to public inspection schedules, which schedules shall contain the charges between all places where persons or property may be carried, the classification of freight, as well as the terminal charges.

Fourth. A provision against changing the schedule except upon thirty days' notice, and an inhibition against charging any greater or less amount than that fixed in the schedule.

Fifth. The filing of copies of schedules with the Commission, including joint tariffs.

Sixth. Prohibiting changing joint rates except on a like notice, and prohibiting the charging of any different sum than is fixed in such joint schedule.

Seventh. The empowering of the Commission to fix rates, and authorizing it to determine whether any practice of the carrier is in violation of the provisions of the act.

Much of the act is merely administrative and has as its object a mere amplification of the former act, although having the force and effect of law.

The matter, however, which I wish to particularly call to your attention at this time is as to the power lodged with the Commission to determine the question of violation of the various provisions contained in the bill as above specified, and more particularly as to the delegation of power to determine the reasonableness of any given rate.

I think we are all reasonably familiar with the general division of the functions of government. We know that there are the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of government. We know also that it is wise that neither of these coordinate branches of government should encroach upon the other. This distinction is not the mere creature of constitutional provision, but inherently exists in all civilized government, at least of the higher types, and distinguishes them from what are known as despotic forms of government. If the executive were clothed with the power to determine when a law had been violated, or to construe the law as enacted, there could be no security to the subject other than the will of the executive. If the legislative branch could enact and execute the law, it would be compelled to designate some person to enforce its edicts. And so we find that throughout the entire history of constitutional government the liberty of the citizen, the security of life and property, have only been maintained by the strict observance of these distinctions. Mr. Cooley, upon this subject, says:

> The difference between the departments undoubtedly is that the legislative makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes the law, and it is said that that which distinguishes a judicial from a legislative act is that the one is a determination of what the existing law is in relation to some existing thing already done or happened, while the other is a predetermination of what the law shall be for the regulation of all future cases falling under its provisions.

In other words, "The law is applied by the one and made by the other." Now, let us test this proposed legislation by these well-known distinctions. It is admitted by the proponents of this measure that the Commission is an administrative body to whom is delegated certain duties in carrying out the will of Congress, and as such is charged with certain legislative duties or functions. In so far as the Commission is administrative it becomes a part of the executive arm of the Government, and as to this can have no legislative authority. But wherein is the Commission administrative? It can not be said that the power to make certain rules and regulations, as given by this bill, is executive, for the reason that these rules and regulations have the force and effect of law, a violation of which is punished by certain prescribed penalties, and hence are the very essence of legislative prerogative. But these powers are attempted to be conferred by this bill. Not only that; the Commission is empowered to determine whether or no there have been any violations of the substantive provisions of the proposed act, but they may also determine whether or no any of their regulations have been violated. It is not only to make the law, but to determine its violation and construe its terms. If we shall say that the Commission shall require reports to be filed and prescribe the form in which they shall be made, or if we shall invest this Commission with power to fix rates which shall be binding upon the railroads in the future, we have most certainly invested it with legislative functions, and when we, in addition thereto, give it the further right to determine when a violation of these provisions has occurred, we have invested it with the very highest judicial functions. Now, the question naturally arises, Can this be done?

We have seen that this Commission under the provisions of this bill may—indeed, it is its duty—prescribe certain regulations for the government of the railroads and fix a maximum rate that may be charged and bring before it persons charged, upon complaint of any person injured, with any violation of the law as well as regulations so adopted. No one can seriously question, I think, the proposition that anyone charged with the violation of the law has the right to be heard in a properly constituted judicial tribunal, whether he be accused of petty larceny or the violation of the law respecting the conduct of the business of a railroad. In either case he is entitled under the Constitution to due process of law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HOGG. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the gentleman will permit me, I would not assume to instruct the gentleman at all, but inasmuch as he has asked the question I would like to ask him, Does not the law provide that the carrier may go into court at any time during the thirty days and have these rights determined to which you have called attention?

Mr. HOGG. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what the bill provides now, and if he does not pay any attention to it——

Mr. HOGG. His rights are precluded.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; his rights are precluded.

Mr. HOGG. That is the very thing I am objecting to, because, I say, that you can not preclude any right a man may have to property or person unless and until he has had an opportunity of testing those rights by the due and orderly process of law, and by that we understand a trial before a properly constituted court.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does he not have that?

Mr. HOGG. No; he has no trial before any court. The United States Supreme Court has held that this Commission is in no sense a court or judicial tribunal.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman? Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. HOGG. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Does the gentleman object to permitting a rate to be made for the future where it has been decided that the existing rate is unreasonable?

Mr. HOGG. Decided by whom?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. By the Commission.

Mr. HOGG. No; I do not think the Commission has any power to decide the reasonableness of a rate.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I only wanted to remind the gentleman that it has been repeatedly held that the rate-making power is legislative and that courts may not make rates.

Mr. HOGG. There is no question about that——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If we are to lodge rate-making power anywhere, it must be in the Commission and not in a court. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that a court may not do that.

Mr. HOGG. There is no question about that at all. I agree with the gentleman entirely. The Supreme Court of the United States has also held that this Commission has no judicial power, and it has also held that the determination of the reasonableness of a rate is a judicial and not a legislative function. Let me read some of the authorities on that question. A case was cited by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL] yesterday, but the latter part of that decision was not read as fully as might be. The first case, I think, that directly passes upon this question is to be found in 134 United States, at page 418. This was the case known as the "Minnesota case." I read:

> This being the construction of the statute by which we are bound in considering the present case, we are of opinion that so construed it conflicts with the Constitution of the United States in the particulars complained of by the railroad company. It deprives the company of its right to a judicial investigation, by due process of law, under the forms and with the machinery provided by the wisdom of successive ages for the investigation judicially of the truth of a matter in controversy, and substitutes therefor, as an absolute finality, the action of a railroad commission which, in view of the powers conceded to it by the State courts, can not be regarded as clothed with judicial functions or possessing the machinery of a court of justice.

Nothing, it seems to me, could be plainer than that this Commission, which this bill seeks to clothe with such ample and unusual powers, does not constitute a court within this decision. But let me read further:

> The question of the reasonableness of a rate of charge for transportation by railroad company, involving as it does the element of reasonableness both as regards the company and as regards the public, is eminently a question for judicial investigation, requiring due process of law for its determination.

Now, I desire to ask these gentlemen, under this decision and the decision that was cited yesterday, what powers they are supposed to have conferred upon this Commission to make their findings as to the reasonableness of a rate determinative of that question, even had they determined it? Even had they concluded that a certain rate was a reasonable rate, it would still be open, it seems to me, to be determined by a court reviewing all the facts in the case as to being reasonable or unreasonable.

In another case cited yesterday by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL], to be found in 167 United States at page 499, Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Company, the following language is used:

> It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable—that is a judicial act; but an entirely different thing to prescribe the rates which shall be charged in the future—that is a legislative act.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman says we can not delegate this rate-making power. Will the gentleman say how we can delegate to a railroad corporation the power to make rates?

Mr. HOGG. We do not give it to a railroad corporation. They have it by common law, and generally by charter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But we create the corporation.

Mr. HOGG. Oh, yes, yes; but sometimes it happens that the thing created imagines it is greater than the creator, and that is one of the cases, I think. [Laughter.]

Many other cases determined by the State courts might be cited sustaining the view we take, that it does not lie in the power of Congress to give to a merely administrative, or, if you please, a deputy legislative body, judicial powers.

But can we devolve upon this Commission legislative functions? It is agreed, on all hands, that the fixing of a future rate is a legislative act. Indeed, among the numerous decisions upon that subject in the States where these commissions have been established, it seems to be the settled doctrine that all the power that can be exercised by these boards must be based fundamentally upon the theory that they are a branch, or rather the agent, of the legislature, and I think it is pretty well agreed that the Commission may fix future rates. But in no case has the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon the power of Congress to invest a commission with this power. It is true that the language used in the Maximum Rate Case might lead us to infer that they would uphold such a power; but in that case they were only passing upon the question as to whether, in the Elkins Act, Congress had in terms conferred such power, and not upon the broader question of the power of Congress to delegate its function of legislation.

But whatever be the outcome of this whole question, I take it for granted that there is power somewhere to correct the evil that we all admit exists. We are not ready to acknowledge that there are wrongs without a remedy. That there may not only be violations of positive law, but also violations of those principles of justice and equity which should guide all men. And while we admit the necessity for action, and know that it is our duty to see that the remedy is had, still we must know that if a remedy is provided which in its terms violates any of the well-known principles of government—principles which can not be ignored even under great stress of circumstances, but must be observed so long as constitutional government shall stand—that the remedy applied must be along the lines most agreeable to these safeguards that have been so wisely provided. We seem to be in a great hurry to reach a result all at once in the administration of this doubtful power. The process of the courts is too slow to satisfy many people. We must have summary proceedings. The President has said so, and the people have authorized him, I suppose, to say so. Well, this probably will be done. Out West once in a while they hang a man and try him afterwards. You get your results in a hurry, but not always satisfactorily. I know of a case where it is said the hanging was a perfect success, but one of the committee, in explaining the transaction, said that while the proceedings were all that could be desired there was just one little drawback—they hung the wrong man. And so, now, while everybody is engaged in the whoop and hurrah business, when you can't even get religion without a brass band, and you are lured to heaven with a fiddle, we are supposed to join in with the cry, "Anything to get there." Well, I am in on this deal, and I hope it is a square one, of which we hear so much and see so little. But I am sure that the people are more interested than anyone in the fact that when done it will stay done. I shall vote for this bill, not that I think it is right as to all its provisions, but it is right as to most of them.

I shall vote for it for other reasons. I am sure my people whose agent I am expect such a vote. That is the great and determinative reason.

We are told that no amendments will meet the approval of the committee, and that all parties are agreed upon this, so far as the committee is concerned; if so, it were futile indeed to suggest that there may be some occasion for amendment. With boot and spur and big stick this bill is to be ridden down hill, with but one saving power—that talk may be had, and that is all. Well, that is a privilege that most of the Members may be able to save out of the situation. Now, as to the outlook for amendments to the bill. I have no doubt but that the lash will be applied, that the order has been given, and that the order comes from high authority—the committee.

It seems to me that an amendment making express and Pullman companies subject to the act would not have been a bad idea; indeed, I fail to see why they were omitted in legislation so drastic and far-reaching.

I had prepared an amendment myself providing for the punishment of those who should ask for or receive preferential rates in the transportation of person or property, but I am well aware that the programme will not allow that these matters be considered.

We are told that the common law is the perfection of wisdom, and that when the world was made it was all very good, but in neither case has the stamp of legislative sanction been placed upon the proposition; but now we have, in general evolution of human knowledge, reached a condition where we can say: "It is finished."

But it isn't finished, and we all know that this vexed question will be before Congress in the years to come, as it has been in years passed, and that any advance must be necessarily slow. And I do not believe it is right that those high in authority should lead the people to believe that this act will end the question. Indeed, I do not imagine, from what has been said by some of the advocates of this measure, that any radical changes will be made. If this is so, then you are gold-bricking the people when you lead them to think that the law is self-acting, self-enforcing. We ought to tell the people that in the very nature of things the operation of the law must be slow; that we can't complain of a fellow to-night and have him hung and quartered before morning.

Mr. Chairman, I do not look for any considerable effect to come from this legislation. The fact that the railroad companies are not here complaining is evidence, to my mind, that they do not greatly fear the operation of the law, even should it be sustained by the courts. Why should we expect any rapid application of this law? Your tribunal can not divide itself up that it may the more readily hear complaints. It must act as an entire body upon these matters, and even if it had nothing else in the world to do but fix rates it could not possibly adjudicate one-tenth of the cases that would be brought before it. Why, it has been determined that in fixing a reasonable rate more than fifty elements enter into it and must be considered; and when you add to that the additional subject of determination that all rates must be remunerative to the carrier, you have practically made it impossible to deal with the question in anything like an intelligent way.

There is one question that I want to ask the people of the West as well as of New England, and that is this: Granting that the Commission is clothed with power to determine when there have been discriminations by the railroads either as to persons or places and there is complaint made by a number of places, say, in the State of Ohio that the roads are giving a preferential rate on certain products, say, from Colorado, whereby the Colorado product is delivered in the market east in competition with the Ohio product, what will the Commission do? Of course no one knows what it will do, but anyone can see what it may do. Should the Commission decide that the place havir ; the natural advantage of location should be entitled to protection in rates from places without this advantage, there is at once presented the whole field of speculation, of guess, of doubt, and maybe disaster. We are all agreed that the cause of the wonderful development of the entire country has been the facilities with which the product of one part has been marketed in another part of the country. If this had not been, the wonderful development of the West could not have been possible, and so through the desire of railroads for gain they have developed a traffic profitable to them and profitable to the people whom they serve.

I do not like government at the discretion of anybody. I would not be willing even to take the discretion of our President in all things, however honest, courageous, and just he may be and is. I prefer positive law—a law so plain that all may understand its provisions, its requirements, and its penalties; a law that reaches all men alike and punishes all men alike; but when you give it to a set of men—I do not care how fair they may be—to say not what the law is, but what it will be, you have gone a long way along the road that in the end will mean a revolution in the very foundation principles of a representative government. I prefer to keep the powers of government as they have been distributed in the fundamental law of the land and as the wisdom of the fathers left it. For this reason I have introduced the bill known as H. R. 10098, believing that in its provisions we departed the least from those well-founded distinctions of the powers of the several branches of government and preserve to the people the right guaranteed to them that they should not be divested of their property without due process of the law. The bill was drawn along the lines suggested by Judge Grosscup, of Chicago, and to one who will deliberately consider it in connection with the many decisions of the courts, and not under the pressure of present demands, I believe it will meet to the largest degree the demands of the times with the least possible infraction of well-known legal distinctions. It is a measure that has been approved by shippers of the United States from every State and Territory, representing in the aggregate more than five thousand millions of business annually. In providing for a court of transportation it but follows the terms of a bill introduced by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission last session, and in its provisions I think will be found to give a more speedy remedy in the end than the bill we are expected to support.

I do not wish to be understood that the bill introduced by myself was perfected by me, or even to any considerable extent my effort. I can say only that its provisions in almost every detail meet my hearty approval. I think its provisions are ample, under the broad powers of the court, indeed powers, that the bill we shall pass can in no wise take away or abridge, to give every remedy for the wrongs complained of, and, in the end, will be found more satisfactory to the people.

In this great rush of doing things and considering them afterwards, I take it, there is great danger to the people. Of course those who believe in personal government—the will of the ruler being the supreme law; those who are revolutionary in their ideas and tendencies—will favor any law that reaches its object at once; but, after all, I think we will agree that it is better to tread along the old beaten pathway, the one along which the progress, achievements, and history of the Republic have been accomplished, and along which alone I firmly believe the destiny of the nation can be realized. It is along these lines that my bill has been framed; for the purpose of preserving to the utmost the right of the individual to the protection which the law of the land guarantees, and that when a violation of law is alleged that question shall be determined between the people and the railroads, just as the issues between the people and an alleged horse thief are determined. We will not presume anyone guilty, either high or low, until they have had that question determined by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Nor will we be content to have the grand jury try the case. We will agree that they may due presentment make, but they shall not try the case.

I do not believe that the people nor the courts will stand for the power sought to be conferred upon this Commission to make a regulation on violation of which a court may be asked to stop the transportation of any commodity over a line of road, and thus punish the communities as well as the companies; nor do I think, for one moment, that the courts can be induced to grant so unusual a remedy.

Imagine, if you please, the vast amount of traffic passing over any one of these great interstate lines of road, reaching hundreds of thousands of people dependent, in large measure, upon the service of the road, and then measure if you can the effect that a decree of a court would have in enjoining all traffic because of some violation of this act or a regulation of the Commission.

In the bill H. R. 10098 a judicial tribunal is provided where all these matters may be tried. Its judges are appointed for life, and hence not subject to varying political conditions. The judges may sit in different parts of the country at the same time, and thus facilitate the hearing of complaints, and upon appeal from any one judge the full court may hear and determine the matter. The reasonableness of a rate or practice can thus be determined in court and the equity powers given to courts be invoked to enforce its decrees. Along some such line ultimately must this whole subject, in my judgment, be determined.

I take it that this bill, introduced by myself at this session of Congress, will secure the hearty approval of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, because I find that at the last session of Congress he introduced a bill almost identical in its provisions with mine, giving the courts the power to determine this question, and hence when he reports this bill back I shall expect the gentleman from Iowa to give me his most hearty support to the bill which I have introduced. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Loud applause.]

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I propose to relieve the committee by saying I am not going to talk about the bill. I think I am justified in using this time, from the fact of having introduced a resolution a few days ago to have a report from the Director of the Census of the amount of cotton to be ginned after January 16, 1906. That report was made in the usual way here yesterday, and I find this statement in the Washington Post of to-day, to which I wish to refer:

HOUSE HEARS FIGURES ON COTTON CROP CENSUS.

The effort to make public the statistics connected with the cotton crop through the agency of the House of Representatives proved a failure. The figures, announced beforehand by the Director of the Census to be inaccurate and incomplete, were sent to the House in accordance with its mandatory resolution, and when made public were denounced alike by Members representing the growers of the South and the cotton manufacturers of New England.

I failed to hear that report denounced by anybody from either side of the House, either from the cotton growers or the manufacturers. In the same article, further on, it says:

According to the census report from data supplied by the ginners, the amount of the cotton crop of 1905 unginned on January 16 aggregated 250,884 bales. It is conceded that this report is incomplete and inaccurate.

Who concedes it, Mr. Chairman? I suppose the author of the article. I do not know who else said it. Then further on it says:

Of the 29,918 ginners of which the Bureau has knowledge only 14,344 made any report. Of these, 1,643 made no estimate, and the 250,884 bales reported come from 12,941 ginners. The remainder made no report whatsoever.

That reads in positive terms as though it were taken from the report itself, and yet there is hardly a figure in that statement that is true. It is amazing to me that a paper published in Washington City, where it can call over the telephone and know the facts, would publish any such statement and give it credit.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman to publish in connection with his remarks the report made by the Director of the Census?

Mr. SIMS. I am going to do that. The report, of which the above is said to be a part, gives the facts, which are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, February 2, 1906.

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, I have the honor to inclose herewith, for transmission to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, a tabular statement of information furnished by ginners in regard to the condition of cotton ginning as of January 16, 1906, from the growth of 1905. This information is required by the following resolution, No. 199, adopted by the House of Representatives, February 1, 1906:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to direct the Director of the Census to compile and transmit to the House of Representatives the ginners' estimates of cotton remaining to be ginned, which were collected in connection with its semimonthly canvass of January 16 last."

Very respectfully, S. N. D. NORTH, Director.

The SECRETARY OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

The following table shows by States (1) the total number of cotton ginneries that have ginned or report that it is their intention to gin any cotton from the growth of 1905; (2) the number of ginneries reporting that all cotton had been ginned prior to January 16, 1906; (3) the number of ginneries that made no estimate or failed to answer the inquiry concerning the estimated quantity of cotton remaining to be ginned; (4) the number of ginneries that gave an estimate of the quantity of cotton remaining to be ginned on January 16, 1906; (5) the number of bales of cotton estimated by ginners as remaining to be ginned on January 16, 1906:

[a] Includes 3 ginneries for Kentucky and 1 for Kansas.

Now, of course it is not absolutely accurate; that is an estimate, and the Director of the Census could not say it is accurate. Neither can anybody say that the estimate is absolutely accurate. But when you consider the value to be given to an estimate of any kind you must have regard to the opportunities of those who make the estimate to know the facts, and in this case it must come from the ginners themselves, as they only can know. There seems to be a systematic effort to make these figures valueless by saying the Director himself discredits them. The New York Commercial of to-day, in speaking of this report, says in part:

Speaker CANNON declared that accuracy could not be claimed for the report. "It is," said he, "a demand for this information for stock-jobbing purposes, and I wash my hands of it."

Why, of course, nobody believes the Speaker of this House said any such thing, and we do not hold him responsible for it at all. This demand came from honest ginners of the South, who gave the information upon the official request of the Director of the Census himself. I read these instructions. A card of instructions was sent out to the agent, which says this:

COTTON CROP GROWN IN 1905.

This report must include all cotton ginned this season, from crop of 1905 up to January 16, 1906, and the estimated quantity to be ginned on and after that date.

INSTRUCTIONS.

Every blank on the reverse side of this card must be filled out. If the establishment has ginned no cotton during the season to the date of the canvass, the word "idle" should be written in the "bale" blank of the card; if the ginnery has been destroyed or abandoned without ginning any cotton this season, the word "dismantled" should be written. No establishment should be marked "idle" or "dismantled" if it has ginned any cotton from the growth of 1905. To illustrate: If only one bale has been ginned, and that at the beginning of the season, this bale should be reported at each canvass throughout the season, and under the head of "remarks" on the card proper explanation should be made, namely, that the ginnery has been burned, dismantled, or idle since ginning the product returned.

The total number of bales ginned to January 16, 1906, by this establishment from the crop grown in 1905 must be reported. This report will, therefore, include the number of bales reported to have been ginned up to January 1, 1906, the date of your eighth report, as well as the number of bales ginned since that date. In cases where there remains cotton to be ginned after the date of your canvass, you will secure from the ginner a carefully prepared estimate of this quantity for the blank provided on the card for this information. If a record of the weight of bales ginned is kept, the actual average weight should be given; but where no record of weights is kept you will not be required to furnish an average weight. Report bales as pressed at ginneries, and do not reduce round bales to the square bale basis.

The card must be signed by the owner or operator of the ginnery, or the failure to secure their signatures explained in accordance with section 4 of "Instructions to local special agents."

If more than one ginnery is owned by one individual, or operated under one management, a separate report must be made for each ginnery.

S. N. D. NORTH, Director.

On the other side of the same card, which I have just read, is the blank space to which I have referred, and which says:

Estimated number of bales yet to be ginned from growth of 1905 by your establishment.

That inquiry is addressed to the individual ginner. Now, Mr. Chairman, the people who grow this cotton, who make it by hard toil, and the ginners who give this report, are not stock-jobbers. They are not interested in cotton gambling, but they are giving these facts as required by law passed by their Representatives, and in reply to an inquiry addressed to them by the official who, by law, is authorized to make it. Why all this systematic effort among these newspapers to make the people believe that these reports are inaccurate and worthless? It is true that 1,641 out of more than 28,000 failed to make a report. Look at the details of that report and see where the greatest number of failures come from. In every instance they are from States that show that they have the least cotton to be ginned. Take the State of South Carolina, with 3,162 gins, with 1,777 reporting nothing to be ginned, with only 1,021 showing any to gin, and the total amount remaining to be ginned being only 9,760 bales, about 9 bales to the gin. From that State the largest number failed to report, namely, 364, which shows that the reason of the failure to report was because there was no further cotton to be ginned and they did not think it worth while to make a report.

But the bears seized upon that fact to say that the report was inaccurate. No estimate is accurate, but estimates are valuable nevertheless. When we have estimates made for a public building or a public improvement, we rely upon them, and money is appropriated upon those estimates, and yet those estimates hardly ever turn out to be accurate. Nevertheless they are valuable and worthy of honest and serious consideration. It looks to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is a systematic effort on the part of some people to try to prevent the natural effect that the truth of this report will have upon the price of cotton.

Who introduced the resolution to report the cotton to be ginned? I did. Who drew it? Director North—every word of it. I have the original in my hand, written by him, every word, and he told me that he desired to have it introduced. Before it was introduced I consulted the chairman of the Committee on Census of this House, and he approved it. The Census Committee made a unanimous report, and this House passed it almost unanimously.

Are you parties to stockjobbing operations? Of course you are not. Nobody thinks the Speaker said it, but it is alleged by respectable newspapers, and the market is affected by it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who is doing all this?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know. I have read to the House from the newspapers which I had before me. But who has a right to say that it is inaccurate? How will anyone know that it is inaccurate unless he waits until the final report is made at the end of the year? Half of the space in the articles I have read is taken up in trying to discredit the report. As I say, I am amazed that a paper in the capital would publish so much misinformation when having so good an opportunity to know the facts.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not a fact that on the publication of this report yesterday cotton went up and down, fluctuated 22 points, and that the fluctuations were due to this report and what it said about it in the cotton exchange?

Mr. SIMS. Why, Mr. Chairman, I suppose cotton fluctuated yesterday. How much it fluctuated I do not know. But it did the day before the report was made, and does every day.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; but did it not fluctuate on the strength of this report, not only in the markets in this country, but in Liverpool?

Mr. SIMS. I am informed that cotton was higher before the report came out and then sagged down, and then went up after it came out and then went down again. The exchange in Liverpool was closed before the report came out.

Mr. PAYNE. And then went up again.

Mr. SIMS. Last evening?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. PAYNE. I think that is what the papers say. The bulls had their inning and the bears had theirs, and then the bulls again, and then the bears.

Mr. SIMS. I think, Mr. Chairman, the falsifiers have had their inning in the statements of the newspapers I have read. "If the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness?" What we read in reputable newspapers we believe to be true, and if not true, how great is our deception?

If the people, especially from the South, do not stop incessantly complaining every time one of these reports is published and believing and repeating every suggestion suspicious of the good faith and honesty of the officials charged with this most valuable work, these reports will be discontinued, and the cotton grower will be turned over to the tender mercy of the great cotton speculators, who are bulls one day and bears the next, and can and will have reports made to order, always to suit the deal on hand by the operator who puts them out. The cotton world has gotten used to these reports of the Government and relies on them. They constitute the balance wheel in the present state of trade and commerce, and untold damage will follow their discontinuance.

Not long since one of the largest cotton exporters in this country told me that after the census report of the cotton ginned of the present crop, published on November 21, 1905, cotton advanced immediately to an amount equal to about $25,000,000 on the approximate amount of the present crop thereafter to come into sight. Before the Government commenced making reports cotton almost always sold at very low prices during the months of heaviest delivery, however short the crop finally proved to be. Often a small crop is marketed with great rapidity during the early fall months. On this account the receipts at ports and interior centers indicate a large crop, and low prices prevail until the cotton is practically all gone out of the hands of the growers. Then after it is too late to benefit the grower. It turns out that the farmers have parted with their cotton at very unremunerative prices while the spinners reap a rich harvest in the low-priced cotton they have in this way been able to procure. Mr. Chairman, I fear it will be a sad day for the cotton farmer when these reports are abolished, and for me, I am opposed to doing or saying anything leading up to such a result.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent to place in the RECORD two or three, or possibly four, sections of the law of the rate-making commission of the State of Iowa, pertinent to the proposition or to the point of a rehearing of a maximum rate and a rate made by a railroad less than the maximum rate.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the general rule adopted by the House, the gentleman having taken the floor for a minute has the right to extend his remarks.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does this bill propose to clothe the Commission with the power, and if yea, is it a continuing power to not only fix but unfix at all times any maximum rate it makes, and also unfix and fix any carrier-made reasonable rate less than that maximum rate?

For example, if the railroad declines to charge, say, $100 (the maximum rate fixed by the Commission) and charges a 90-cent rate (less than the maximum), which becomes oppressive—

First. Has the Commission the power to unfix and refix that maximum rate?

Second. Has it the power to unfix and refix this 90-cent rate?

Third. If it has, is this or are these powers continuing?

Fourth. Who can have either or both these rates unfixed and refixed, and by what procedure?

If this bill empowers the Commission to unfix and refix at "all times" its maximum rates, and any rate less than this maximum rate, and also allows "any" person or concern to have a rehearing of the maximum rate in the case in which it was fixed, or allows "any" person or concern to file a complaint and have the Commission to unfix and refix this 90-cent rate less than this maximum of $1, does this bill plainly and unmistakably say so? If not, then, let the bill be amended and made to say so in plain English, thus avoiding suits to construe it and delay and harass litigants.

The legislatures of Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, and South Dakota in plain English clearly give these rights and powers. Compare the abstruse language of the bill on these subjects with the plain words of the Iowa rate-fixing statute, under which but few suits have arisen.

Read this language (sec. 2138, Iowa rate-fixing commission law):

The board shall from time to time, and as often as circumstances may require, change and revise such schedule, but the rates fixed shall not be higher than established by law.

These words, or those similar and in effect the same, are found in the Illinois, Nebraska, and South Dakota laws. In Illinois the language is as follows:

Said commissioner shall from time to time, and as often as circumstances may require, change and revise such schedule. (77 Ill., 444, 445, 446; C. B. and Q. R. R. v. People.)

The South Dakota statute provides:

SEC. 450. Said commissioners shall from time to time, and as often as circumstances may require, change and revise such schedule.

The Iowa Code (sec. 2123) also provides:

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation, etc., shall be reasonable and just, and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

[Iowa Code. Railroad rate commission law.]

SEC. 2134. Complaint.—Any person, firm, or corporation or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this chapter in contravention thereof may apply to said board by petition, briefly stating the facts; whereupon a copy of the complaint with the damages, if any are claimed, shall be forwarded by the board to such carrier, who shall be requested to satisfy the complaint, or answer the same in writing within a reasonable time to be fixed by the board. If such carrier within the time specified shall make reparation for the injury alleged to have been done, or shall correct the wrong complained of, it shall be relieved of liability to the complainant for the particular violation complained of. If it shall not satisfy the complaint within the time fixed, or there shall appear to be any reasonable ground for investigating the complaint, the board shall inquire into the matters complained of in such manner and by such means as it shall think proper. Whenever it has sufficient reason to believe that any carrier is violating any provision of this chapter, it shall at once institute an inquiry, as though complaint had been made. No complaint shall at any time be dismissed because of the absence of direct damage to the complainant. (Same, sec. 13.)

These words unmistakably give the Commission the power, and a continuing power, to fix and unfix any and all improper rates. Sections 2138 and 2141, Iowa law, read thus:

SEC. 2138. Commissioners' schedules of rates—Effect.—The schedules of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of freight and cars, together with the classification of such freights now in effect, shall remain in force until changed by the board according to law, which, in all actions brought against railway corporations, wherein there are involved the charges thereof for the transportation of any freight or cars or any unjust discrimination in relation thereto, shall be taken as prima facie evidence in all courts that the rates fixed therein are reasonable and just maximum rates of charge for which said schedules have been prepared.

The board shall from time to time, and as often as circumstances may require, change and revise such schedules, but the rates fixed shall not be higher than established by law. The board shall give notice of its intention to revise or change such schedules by publishing a notice thereof in two weekly newspapers published at the seat of government, for two consecutive weeks, and the last publication of such notice shall be at least ten days before the time fixed for considering the matter, and such notice shall contain, in general terms, a statement of the matters the board proposes to consider, and the date when and the place where the matter will be taken up, and shall be addressed to all persons interested therein.

When any schedule is thus revised the board must cause notice thereof to be published for two successive weeks in some public newspaper printed at the seat of government, which shall state the date of the taking effect thereof, and it shall take effect at the time so stated. A printed copy of such revised schedule shall be conspicuously posted by said common carrier in each freight office and passenger depot upon all lines affected thereby, and when certified by the board that the same is a true copy prepared by it for the railway company or corporation therein named, and that notice thereof had been published as required by law, shall be received in evidence in all actions as prima facie the schedule of such board.

SEC. 2141. Determination.—After such hearing and investigation, the board shall fix and determine the maximum charges to be thereafter made by the railroad company or common carrier complained of, which charge shall in no event exceed the one now or hereafter fixed by law; and the board shall render their decision in writing and shall spread the same at length in the record to be kept for that purpose; such decision shall specifically set out the sums or rate which the railroad company or common carrier so complained of may thereafter charge or receive for the service therein named, and including a classification of such freight; and the board shall not be limited in their said decision and the schedule to be contained therein to the specific case or cases complained of, but it shall be extended to all such rates between points in this State, and whatever part of the line of railway or such company or common carrier within this State may have been fairly within the scope of such investigation; and any such decision so made and entered on record of the board, including any such schedules and classifications, shall, when duly authenticated, be received and held in all suits brought against any such railroad corporation or common carrier wherein is in any way involved the charges of any such corporation or carrier mentioned in said decisions, in any of the courts of this State, as prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable maximum rates, the same as the schedule made by the board as provided in section 2138 hereof; and the rates and classifications so established after such hearing and investigation shall, from time to time thereafter, upon complaint duly made, be subject to revision by the board, the same as any other rates and classifications.

But the legislature of Iowa didn't stop with giving its commission the power to unfix and refix its schedule at any time, but went still further and provided for relief against any rate made by the carrier of the commission, giving "any person" or concern the right to attack the same and plainly say so.

I now read sections 2139, 2140, 2141, and 2142, Iowa law, covering the proceedings in such cases:

VIOLATION OF SCHEDULE.

SEC. 2139. Complaint of violation of schedule.—When any person in his own behalf, or in behalf of a class of persons similarly situated, or a firm, corporation, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization, shall make complaint to the board of railway commissioners that the rate charged or published by any railway company, or the maximum rates fixed by the board in the schedule of rates made by it, or the maximum rate fixed by law, is unreasonably high or discriminating, the board shall investigate the matter, and, if the charge appears to be well founded, fix a day for hearing the same, giving the railway company notice of the time and place thereof by mail, directed to any division superintendent, general or assistant superintendent, general manager, president, or secretary of such company, which notice shall contain the substance of the complaint, also the person or persons complaining. (Same, sec. 18.)

SEC. 2140. Hearing evidence.—Upon the hearing the board shall receive any evidence and listen to any arguments offered or presented by either party relevant to the matter under investigation, and the burden of proof shall not be upon the person or persons making the complaint; but it shall add to the showing made at such hearing whatever information it may then have, or can obtain from any source, including schedules of rates actually charged by any railway company for substantially the same kind of service, in this or any other State.

The lowest rates published or charged by any railway company for substantially the same kind of service, whether in this or another State, shall, at the instance of the person or persons complaining, be accepted as prima facie evidence of a reasonable rate for the services under investigation; and if the railway company complained of is operating a line of railroad beyond the State, or has a traffic arrangement with any such railway company, the same shall be taken into consideration in determining what is a reasonable rate; if it be operating a line of railway beyond the State, the rate charged or established for substantially a similar or greater service by it in another State shall also be considered. (Same, sec. 19.)

SEC. 2141. Determination.—After such hearing and investigation, the board shall fix and determine the maximum charges to be thereafter made by the railroad company or common carrier complained of, which charge shall in no event exceed the one now or hereafter fixed by law; and the board shall render their decision in writing, and shall spread the same at length in the record to be kept for that purpose; such decision shall specifically set out the sums or rate which the railroad company or common carrier so complained of may thereafter charge or receive for the service therein named, and including a classification of such freight; and the board shall not be limited in their said decisions and the schedule to be contained therein to the specific case or cases complained of, but it shall be extended to all such rates between points in this State, and whatever part of the line of railway of such company or common carrier within this State may have been fairly within the scope of such investigation; and such decisions so made and entered on record of the board, including any such schedules and classifications, shall, when duly authenticated, be received and held in all suits brought against any such railroad corporation or common carrier, wherein is in any way involved the charges of any such corporation or carrier mentioned in said decisions, in any of the courts of this State, as prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable maximum rates, the same as the schedule made by the board as provided in section 2138 hereof; and the rates and classifications so established, after such hearing and investigation, shall, from time to time thereafter, upon complaint duly made, be subject to provision by the board, the same as any other rates and classifications. (Same, sec. 20.)

SEC. 2142. Proceedings of commissioners.—The board may in all cases conduct its proceedings, when not otherwise prescribed by law, in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and the attainment of justice. A majority of the board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest. It may from time to time make or amend such general rules or orders as may be necessary for the preservation of order and the regulation of proceedings before it, including forms of notice and the service thereof, which shall conform as nearly as may be to those in use in the courts of the State. Any party may appear before it and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official action thereof shall be entered of record, and, upon the request of either party or person interested, its proceedings shall be public. It shall have a seal, of which courts shall take judicial notice. (Same, sec. 21.)

In addition to this language, we are referred for these refixing rights and powers to words of the bill, as follows (p. 14):

The Commission shall be authorized to suspend or modify its orders upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper.

"Its" orders are not the rates fixed by the carrier.

The 90-cent rate is the carrier's order or rate. It is not the order of the Commission.

We are also referred to language of the bill on page 18:

That after a decision, order, or requirement has been made by the Commission in any proceeding any party thereto may at any time make application for rehearing of the same.

"Parties thereto" can, by these words, get a rehearing on the dollar rate in the old suit. Outside parties can not. They are not "parties thereto"—and can not become parties—and do not complain of the $1 or maximum rate, but of the 90-cent rate not fixed in the old case. He must file, it is claimed, a petition de novo, under section 13, above quoted, and section 15 of the act of 1887, as amended by the language, page 10 of the bill, above quoted. Surely the language I have quoted from the bill on the right of "any" person to have any oppressive rate unfixed and refixed and the power of the Commission to refix any and all rates, at any time, is not as plain as we can make it or should make it, and hence I cite the committee to the Iowa law, which clearly and plainly grants all rights to the citizen and all powers necessary to the commission to unfix and refix any and all improper rates at any and all times.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] refers us for these rights and powers to language in the bill, as follows:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged.

This is found on page 10 of this bill amending section 15, act 1887.

Section 13 (act 1887) here referred to and amended is in the same language substantially as section — of the Iowa law above quoted, and reads thus:

That any person, firm, corporation, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization, complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act in contravention of the provisions thereof, may apply to said Commission by petition, which shall briefly state the facts; whereupon a statement of the charges thus made shall be forwarded by the Commission to such common carrier, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint or to answer the same in writing within a reasonable time, to be specified by the Commission.

APPENDIX.

March 2, 1873, the State of Illinois enacted a railroad rate-making commission law, section 8 of which, as stated by the supreme court In re C., B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. People (77 Ill., 444, 445, and 446) is as follows:

Section 8 directs the railroad and warehouse commissioners—to make for each of the railroad corporations doing business in this State, as soon as practicable, a schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight and cars on each of said railroads; and said schedule shall, in all suits brought against any such railroad corporations wherein is in any way involved the charges of any such corporation for the transportation of any passenger or freight or cars, or unjust discrimination in relation thereto, be deemed and taken in all courts of this State as prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freights and cars upon the railroads for which said schedules may have been respectively prepared.

Said commissioners shall, from time to time, and as often as circumstances may require, change and revise said schedules. When any schedules shall have been made or revised as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of said commissioners to cause publication thereof to be made for three successive weeks in some public newspaper published in the city of Springfield, in this State: Provided, That the schedules thus prepared shall not be taken as prima facie evidence, as herein provided, until schedules shall have been prepared and published as aforesaid for all the railroad companies now organized under the laws of this State, and until the 15th day of January, A. D. 1874, or until ten days after the meeting of the next session of this general assembly, provided a session of the general assembly shall be held previous to the 15th day of January, aforesaid, etc.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of speaking in support of the pending bill. It is a maxim of the law that where there is a wrong there is a remedy. It is a little remarkable that in a broad and comprehensive system of jurisprudence like that of the United States this maxim is found to be mere fiction when applied to interstate railroads. Here we have wrongs and abuses for which the law has provided no ample remedy. The laws now upon our statute books intended to correct such abuses have proven powerless, and I consider the enactment of additional legislation which will guarantee a more effectual control and regulation of the rates of interstate railroads as the most important subject of legislation before the American Congress to-day. Unlike the question of Federal control of insurance, so eloquently and ably discussed at the beginning of this session, and concerning which there was expressed such wide difference of opinion, in this case there is and can be no doubt as to our constitutional authority to act; there is and can be no doubt as to our jurisdiction over the subject-matter. In Article I, section 8, of the Federal Constitution it is declared, among other things, that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." By this provision of the organic law the States, by express terms, have delegated to Congress the power to regulate commerce between the several States, and thus and thereby lodged in Congress the power to supervise, control, and regulate the rates of railroads and other common carriers engaged in interstate commerce.

The legislatures of the States have no power to legislate upon the subject. The courts of the States or of the United States have no legislative powers or legislative functions. The responsibility for such legislation rests upon Congress, and upon Congress alone. We are here as the Representatives of the American people, and from every quarter, whether we be Democrats or Republicans, our constituents—the American producer, the American shipper, and the American public generally—are demanding such legislation at our hands.

The people are aggrieved. They feel that an injustice has been done them and is being done them by the railroads, and they are demanding relief. It is hardly fair for us on this side of the Chamber to claim that this sentiment is wholly Democratic, because, forsooth, this proposed legislation has been demanded in three of our national Democratic platforms. It is hardly fair for you, on the other side of the aisle, to claim that it is wholly Republican because it has been twice submitted to Congress by a Republican President. It is more accurate to state that this sentiment knows no party lines and is circumscribed by no party bounds, but that it is a truly American sentiment. [Applause.] It stands for justice; it stands for fair play. There seems to be a widespread misapprehension on the part of the railroad people and their representatives as to what the American public is demanding and as to what the American Congress is seeking to do. It is not the purpose of anybody, so far as I am advised, to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other administrative body with authority to initiate rates or revise general schedules of railroad companies. That is a matter that is to be left primarily to the railroads, as now, and so long as they refrain from violating existing law by charging extortionate, unreasonable, and discriminatory rates, or giving preferential rates or giving rebates, it is not proposed that the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other body should interfere with their established rates and schedules. The sole purpose of this legislation, so far as it relates to the fixing of rates, as I understand it, is to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission so as to authorize such Commission, upon complaint made by any shipper or other person aggrieved, to inquire into the alleged violation of law, and if after a full and fair investigation of all the facts it is ascertained that the law has been violated, then to set aside the unlawful rate and to substitute in lieu thereof a reasonable rate, which shall take effect immediately upon notice and shall remain in force until annulled by a court of competent jurisdiction. Is there anything harsh, revolutionary, or unreasonable in that proposition? Why should it not be done? In this country of ours, founded upon principles of equality and justice, why should one person or one corporation be permitted, in plain violation of law, to deal unfairly and unjustly with another person or corporation or with a community and yet the injured party have no redress and no remedy under the law? Concede that the railroads intend absolute fairness. Is it not possible for the traffic managers or rate-making agencies of the railroads to make mistakes? Do they not err? Is it not possible for them by accident or inadvertence to impose an unjust rate upon some shipper? If so, then is it not right, in case of disagreement between the railroad companies and the injured shipper, that there should be some public, disinterested tribunal, some agency established by the Government, wherein and whereby the injured shipper may have a remedy, may redress the wrong and be relieved of the hardship and injustice done him? To my mind the proposition is self-evident. But when we are confronted with the real situation, namely, that the managers of railroads, like other men, are possessed of selfishness and greed, except perhaps in a more marked degree—when we review the history of the railroads and contemplate the numerous instances of injustice and oppression that they have imposed upon their patrons and customers—then the demand for such legislation rests not alone upon expediency, but upon the high ground of imperative public necessity. [Loud applause.]

But we were told the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] that he was opposed to this bill because he believed this bill was a step in favor of Government ownership and had a socialistic tendency about it. The distinguished gentleman made a magnificent argument based upon that premise, but I submit that his premise is false.

I submit the very contrary of this premise is true. This legislation, instead of furthering socialism and being a step toward Government ownership, will result as a check upon that growing sentiment. It is not the advocacy of this legislation that has created in the public mind in America these socialistic tendencies; and, by way of digression, permit me to suggest the real cause. I want to say here that I have no prejudice against railroads nor against corporations, but I can not say as much concerning the corrupt management of these great and useful corporations by men who are using them as instrumentalities of oppression, as a means of exploiting the public and the stockholders.

The McCalls, the McCurdys, the Rogerses, the Rockefellers, and the Morgans are the men that are sowing in this fair land the seeds of anarchy and revolution. [Applause.] Henry H. Rogers may defy for a time the courts of the great State of Missouri. He may twit Attorney-General Hadley as a young man seeking notoriety. Attorney-General Hadley will easily attain his purpose, if such it be, and that may not disturb Mr. Rogers in the least. But these masters of finance should remember that, while the exposures made by Folk and by Hughes and by Hadley have brought not only notoriety but substantial renown to these heroic advocates of civic virtue, behind it all is an intelligent, outraged, independent people, who believe in law and order, who have imposed upon themselves the burdens of taxation to maintain courts and uphold the law, who will not long tolerate the defiance of law and courts by the greatly rich in this country. [Applause.]

We have, Mr. Chairman, in America a feudalism not of landed estates, but of trusts. There has been permitted to grow up under our system a class of unrestricted monopolies that have amassed great wealth. By secret understandings, by pools, by consolidations, and by combinations, commonly known as "trusts," they have unified these moneyed interests and have concentrated into the hands of a few men the power to dominate vast aggregations of wealth. These few men constitute the lords of the manor in American finance. The people are the vassals, and in lieu of military service, which none of us would render in their unholy cause, we are compelled to pay a money tribute to these financial brigands, these marauding chiefs of high finance, who with the stride of a colossus stalk up and down the continent, unrestrained by law, and with the iron heel of tyranny trample under foot the rights of the people. [Applause.]

I submit to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] that it is this condition of affairs that is creating in the public mind these socialistic and anarchistic tendencies, if you please, and not the advocacy of wholesome measures of legislation such as the one now under consideration.

I have no prejudice, as I have already said, against the railroads. They have been great and mighty factors in building up our country. Nobody wants to destroy them. Without them we could never have attained the one-hundredth part of the prosperity we now enjoy. They have been the means of building up our large cities, of developing and settling up our great States, and of rendering the American Republic the brightest jewel in the civilization of the world. We owe much to the railroads; but while it is true that the public owes much to the railroads, the railroads owe everything to the public. No association of men or of corporations could afford to own any great line of railroad for their own private use, however great their fortunes or their industries. The railroad lives, thrives, and derives its profits from the public. It owes to that public a duty, and that is to deal fairly with it, not to impose an unjust burden upon its patrons as a whole and not to resort to discriminations between individuals and between communities. Those engaged in this line of business have amassed colossal fortunes. I hope I will not offend the pride of any of the railroad dignitaries—these fortunate possessors of predatory wealth, some of whose daughters have intermarried with the nobility of Europe—but I propose to deal in some plain facts. I propose to define the true status of the railroad and the railroad people in the body politic. The railroad is a corporation. It is a common carrier, and its duties and functions and obligations are the same as those of common carriers of two hundred years ago. These managers and high officials of railroads are sometimes called "captains of industry." The railroad derives its power to act from the charter granted to it by the State. It is a creature of law and has no inalienable rights. There is nothing sacred about it; it is not divine in origin; its owners are not descended from kings or princes. Their work is menial in the strictest sense of the term. They work for hire. Notwithstanding the bright lights, the gilded finishings and the velvet furnishings of its palace cars and the awe-inspiring swiftness of its powerful locomotives, the railroad in its functions and purposes is a common carrier and in its mission it is merely the successor of the dray cart, the pack mule, the road wagon, and the old stagecoach. And these captains of industry that we hear so much about are the lineal descendants, as it were, of the draymen, the mule driver, the teamster, and the grandiloquent stage driver of the olden times. Then on what meat does this our Cæsar feed that he is grown so great, that he should demand that he above all other men and that his interests above all other interests in this country should be held in complete immunity and exemption from the provisions of the law?

But we are told that while Congress has the constitutional authority to legislate upon this subject, we can not enact a law empowering a commission or administrative board with authority to fix a rate without violating the Constitution. This I deny. I contend that when the people of the States delegated to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, reserving to themselves no limitation whatever, that that carried with it the full power and authority to enact whatever legislation might be necessary in order to carry into force and effect these delegated powers.

I claim that in legislating upon this subject Congress has all the powers that the British Parliament, which is unrestricted by constitutional limitations, has in legislating upon any subject before that body. I claim that Congress has all the power to legislate upon this subject that the people of the several States have in establishing or modifying their State constitutions over matters and things not inhibited by the Federal Constitution.

I have not time to quote the decisions in support of this proposition, but will cite the cases of McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 315; Stone et al. v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, 116 United States, 307; Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, 154 United States, 362.

But to all of this the railroads are opposed. They tell us that the rate making is an exceedingly complicated subject. This is admitted on all sides. I am not going to take the position that it is not, but I am going to take the position that it is not an incomprehensible subject. I believe that other men and other agents save and except those engaged in railroading can comprehend, can understand, this subject as well as the railroad people.

I believe the railroads have exaggerated the difficulties of this complex subject with a view to covering up from the public a clear insight into their inequitable system of rate making.

Even Judge Grosscup, of the United States circuit court of appeals, for whose opinions I have the highest respect and whose proposed plan of regulating rates I have carefully considered, seems to have been led into a serious error on this subject. He has taken the position that the United States courts as now constituted are incompetent tribunals to try these railroad cases, partly on account of being engrossed with other business and partly on account of the complicated nature of rate schedules. He is led into the further error of advocating the establishment of a separate court, to be known as the "transportation court." He further recommends the selection of the judges of this court, or at least that some of them be selected, from the railroad people—from the traffic men of the railroads, I suppose, for they know most about rate schedules.

This is the very point we desire to avoid. The fixing of rates is now in the hands of the agents and traffic managers of the railroads. I do not say that they always do injustice. I do not believe they always do injustice. They may fix just and reasonable rates in a hundred cases, but if at the same time they fix unjust and unreasonable rates in any smaller number of cases those persons and corporations against whom such unjust and unreasonable rates are imposed are entitled to redress under any just system of government, and we as lawmakers, on account of the complexity of the subject, ought not to be deterred from providing ample means for such relief.

There is much division of opinion on the subject, due largely, I think, to the efforts of the railroads to forestall further legislation. Several months ago they instituted a campaign of literature against this proposed legislation. No candidate for public office, no chairman of a political organization in a heated campaign, was ever more diligent and persistent in sending out literature, circulars, and documents than have been the railroads in their campaign against this proposed measure. During the whole summer and fall, day after day, they poured literature of all kinds in opposition to governmental regulation and governmental rate making in upon my desk, and, I suppose, upon the desk of every other Member of this House—newspaper clippings, magazine articles, books, papers, and periodicals. In one pamphlet are given the names of over 400 shippers who registered their opposition to it, but a close analysis of this publication discloses that most of the organizations protesting are privy to the railroads. In fact, I have come into the possession of an elaborate library upon the subject, and they have not contented themselves with sending out the works and productions of railroad economists published on this side of the Atlantic. I received an English text-book on this subject, written by one William Ackworth, of London. In this book is one whole chapter devoted to the futility of parliamentary interference.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], who opposes this bill, on yesterday quoted Mr. Ackworth as a leading authority upon railroad economics in England. Now, I desire to pay my respects to this distinguished author. Railroad rate making is generally considered to be complicated, but according to this distinguished writer it is very simple—in fact, as simple as the Spanish doctor's art of the practice of medicine. I read the story in Gil Blas.

There lived in Madrid a physician who had grown very rich in the practice of medicine. He had about his office a young man employed to do his chores—to build the fires and sweep his floors—for whom he had formed a peculiar attachment. So he took the young man aside one day and told him that he desired to make a doctor of him. The young man insisted that he did not have sufficient education; that he knew nothing about anatomy or hygiene or physiology or a hundred other things pertaining to medical science. The old doctor said, "Young man, that matters not; I am now going to give you the whole secret of the art of the practice of medicine in a few words. It consists in copiously bleeding the patient and then giving him great drafts of hot water."

Now, this distinguished railroad economist, Mr. W. M. Ackworth, of London, clears up this whole mystified subject of rate making in a few words. He says it consists in "charging what the traffic will bear"—in other words, like the Spanish doctor's universal remedy, it consists in copiously bleeding the shipper and then giving him great drafts of, not hot water, but hot air [laughter] when he makes a complaint. This distinguished author also says that this system of rate making has been adopted by all the great railroads of Europe and the American railroads. He says that for some reason, not very obvious to him, the expression "charging what the traffic will bear" has fallen into disrepute, and he gives it as his candid opinion that if the railroads at the outset, instead of using that expression, had adopted another and said that "they tempered the wind to the shorn lamb," that they could have proceeded with the identical methods they are now adopting, and it would have been very popular with the people. [Laughter and prolonged applause.]

I can not subscribe to such doctrine. It will deceive nobody. Such silly effort to belittle the intelligence of the masses is unworthy of a great writer, for beneath the plain apparel of the common people beat hearts as brave and true as were ever covered by royal purple or by cloth of gold, and from their humble abodes have sprung the masters of thought in every age and country. You can not deceive them on this freight-rate question by telling them that you "temper the winds to the shorn lamb."

Away with such sophistry. No gentle words will relieve the burden of him who bears upon his neck a cruel yoke; no gentle words will rend the shackles of him who is chained, like Prometheus, to a rock; and no shifting of phrases or juggling with words will lessen the burden of the miner, the miller, the farmer, the fruit grower, the merchant or other producer, or the shipper whose profits are exhausted by extortionate or discriminatory charges, and who is thus ground down under an unjust and unlawful system of railroad rates instituted and enforced against him in defiance of and in plain violation of law.

The only remedy for this last-named form of oppression will be found in additional and more effectual legislation concerning interstate railroad rates. Congress has the power to afford this remedy, and I am in favor of exercising that power to the full extent. I believe that we should pass this bill, which, enacted into law, will give to the Interstate Commerce Commission full power and authority to deal with every question of inequality or injustice growing out of or incidental to our interstate commerce. The provisions of this bill apply not only to interstate railroads, but also to private cars, terminal lines, and express companies engaged in interstate commerce.

I think that the Committee on Interstate Commerce and the country at large are to be congratulated upon the fact that the passage of this measure has been recommended by the unanimous report of this great committee, consisting of eighteen members, including both Democrats and Republicans. I for one, in compliment to said committee, shall vote for the bill as submitted to the House without modification or amendment.

Enact this law and you will have stricken a herculean blow against that sentiment in this country in favor of municipal ownership, so recently manifested in the mayoralty elections of the great cities of Chicago and New York. Do this, and when Congress adjourns and you return to your respective homes, whether you hail from Maine or Texas, Washington or Florida, or from the great States of the Middle West or Mississippi Valley, whether you be Democrat or Republican, I believe you will receive the plaudits of a grateful constituency, who will approve your course and who in emphasis of such approval will grapple you to their hearts with hooks of steel and commend you as devoted, faithful servants of the plain people.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I feel like using half the time assigned me in apologizing to the committee for detaining it past the usual time of adjournment.

Mr. ADAMSON. We were saving the best for the last.

Mr. PAGE. I thank the gentleman for the honor he does me.

Mr. Chairman, the situation in which we find ourselves is, to say the least of it, a peculiar and unusual one. In all the history of legislation in this country public sentiment has been the controlling factor. Very rarely, if ever before, has public sentiment been so strong upon one side of any question as to force from a great committee of this House, composed of eighteen gentlemen of almost every varying shade of public thought, a unanimous report. By searching the record, or even by a slight effort of memory, we find that only one year ago this same body was representative of every shade of thought as touching railroad-rate legislation. The bill presented by the majority at that time and passed this House contained no mention of private car lines or terminals. It was cumbered by a lot of court machinery. Neither did the substitute, offered by this side of the House, contain either of these provisions. Not to recall unpleasant facts, neither the majority or the minority were agreed. Does this great change in the attitude of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of the House argue a nearer approach to each other of the two parties represented here? Does it argue a demand stronger now than then on the part of the great public as distinguished from the corporate interests of the country? Does it argue stronger pressure from the other end of the avenue? Or all three?

No man will deny the large part played by the railroads in the development of this country. I heartily join in all the praise bestowed upon them by gentlemen who have preceded me. Without them our population would be confined to the seaboard and waterways, numbering possibly twenty million instead of eighty, our trade and wealth insignificant, the mighty empire beyond the Mississippi a wilderness, inhabited largely by savages. Human slavery would most likely be still in existence. Upon their prosperity to-day directly and indirectly the life of the nation depends. Still every person knows that, in spite of the great part they have played and are still playing in the development and prosperity of the country, they are the creatures of the State and should be under its control.

No man questions the right of the Federal Government to control that traffic over them that passes from one State to another or into foreign territory. It is not a question of right—rather one of expediency. Shall the country control the roads or the roads the country? has come to be a familiar question, the presumption being, left uncontrolled, they grow beyond the power of the Government. Indeed, we have among us those so pessimistic as to desire that we have already lost the reins, and the country is being controlled by the roads and their allies, the trusts. How much of truth there is in this each man must judge for himself. But, Mr. Chairman, to that particular feature of the measure under consideration that I desire to discuss.

I find in the report accompanying this bill, on page 3, this language:

> It is proper here to say to those who complain of this legislation that the necessity for it is the result of the misconduct of carriers. Not necessarily of all, but certainly very many of them have indulged in some form of violation of the law. The law to-day would be fairly satisfactory to all shippers if the spirit of fairness required by it had controlled the conduct of the carriers, and the necessity for the proposed legislation is the result of and is made necessary by the misconduct of parties who are now most clamorous against additional restraint. If the carriers had in good faith accepted existing statutes and obeyed them there would have been no necessity for increasing the powers of the Commission or the enactment of new coercive measures.

Is not this an outright admission on the part of the committee having had this matter under consideration that what has been needed, and is needed now, is an enforcement of existing law rather than the enactment of more law? If I accept this report I am forced to accept this view of the situation, and I am free to confess that I had accepted it before the report came into this House, and believe had the great pressure of public sentiment and the equally effective pressure of the executive head of the Government been brought to bear upon those charged with the execution of the law already on the statute books vastly more would have been accomplished than will be by the enactment of this measure into law. [Applause.] In the States and in the nation there has developed a sentiment that, when anything has gone wrong, clamors for "the passing of a law" when the necessity would be removed by a faithful execution of existing law.

I believe the clamor of the great masses of our people for additional legislation upon this subject, because of their slight knowledge of the intricacies of railroad traffic, has been misdirected. With unerring judgment the people of this country know when they are being wronged; because of imperfect information they are very often mistaken both as to the reason of the wrong and the method that should be employed to right the wrong. In almost every community in the United States people saw some individual or corporation receiving from the transportation companies something they were denied. The people of one town saw another prospering beyond theirs without apparent natural reasons. It was discovered that by ownership of cars certain great noncarrying corporations had been able to advance the cost of transportation, and instead of demanding the execution of law in the one instance and the enactment of laws to cover the other, the force of their complaint was directed at that from which they were suffering in a minor degree—the rate charged. There has never been a clearer demonstration of the power of the people under our form of government to effect legislation than in this instance, and its exhibition should silence forever those among us who pessimistically declare that power has departed from the people.

This body and that at the other end of this building constitute the medical staff of the 80,000,000 of the people—to doctor the ills of the body politic and to keep in health the nation. They—the people—complained to us that they were ill of railroad domination. We, in turn, referred the case, as is our custom, to a select few, supposed to have special knowledge of the particular disease complained of. After due deliberation and consultation they have accomplished the very unusual feat for doctors of any school of reaching a unanimous opinion both as to the disease and the necessary remedy. [Laughter.] Reporting back to us, they say, in effect, as before quoted from page 3 of the report, that had the medicine formerly prescribed been administered by the nurse the patient would have had no cause of complaint as to his present condition; but because of the failure of the nurse to perform his duty we prescribe so and so. This additional dose they propose to leave in the hands of the same nurse to administer, and solemnly tell the patient he will soon be well. I am reminded of an old herb doctor in my State who was called to see a patient, suffering greatly from some unknown malady that had baffled the skill of the family physician. The quack carefully thumped the suffering patient, felt his pulse, examined his tongue, and went through all the usual formalities. He then turned to the weeping and distressed wife and children and said solemnly: "He is in a bad fix, I must confess. I do not know what's the matter with him, nor can I, in his present condition, do anything to relieve him, but I'll tell you what I can do. I can throw him into fits, and I'm hell on fits." [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I sincerely hope the patient may survive the fit.

Another clause of this report says: "This bill does not attempt to give power to the Commission to readjust classifications of freight." To have done so would have necessitated the formation of a bureau, the like of which this Government has never seen; still, the failure to do so destroys in great measure the effectiveness of the power bestowed. This is not a new question, but one that has engaged the attention of legislators, as has been shown by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], since the sixties. It is one that I fear, in one form or another, will engage their attention during the life of the Republic.

In discussing this question the other day, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] said the charge had been made by the railroad interest of the country, of demagoguery on the part of the Congress in dealing with this question, and intimated that the charge could be hurled back with equal truth. I think the charge in both instances could be sustained. I do not believe that the laboring man, the honest business man, or the roads themselves are going to be injured by the passage of this bill. If I did I should not vote for it. Neither do I believe that the widows and orphans or other investors in railroads stocks are going to be injured, or I should not vote for it. I think all these charges and fears are utterly groundless.

True there is danger to every interest concerned—the people and the railroads—by the investing in any seven men the power that goes to this Commission with the enactment of this bill into law, possibly more dangerous to the people than to the railroads, for the power of the one is hard to concentrate, and effective only when concentrated, while the power of the other is already concentrated and ever ready for effective action.

Not being a lawyer, and therefore having nothing to lose by venturing legal opinions, at least by interrogation; are the lawyers of this body agreed that the legislative branch of the Government has the right to confer this power? From my legal friends I have had varying opinions. If not, what becomes of the power to name a rate in the place of one found unreasonable? I venture the assertion that there has always existed the power under the common law to correct an unreasonable or extortionate charge. However, a layman never knows how to account for the law. In these latter days we have seen some strange things in its name; for instance, a decision that finds a corporation guilty but the officers of that corporation guiltless.

Mr. Chairman, my criticisms, if they may be called such, have not been made in a carping spirit, nor in the spirit of antagonism to the proposed legislation. No Member of this body sees more clearly than myself the necessity of doing something. The bill has in it many necessary and vital features for effective control. The one idea I wanted to emphasize was the necessity of execution, and to bring this about by arousing public sentiment to the point where its pressure will be brought to bear at the necessary place. If the passage of this act, and the discussion here and elsewhere shall focus public sentiment upon those charged with the execution of the law, as it has been focused in the State of Missouri, the State of Ohio, and the city of Philadelphia, there will be other Folks, Pattisons, and Weavers; the rights of the people will be preserved, and no honest man or corporation will be made to suffer. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VREELAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad rate bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DRYDEN. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 28) to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, to report it favorably without amendment. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to it.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the joint resolution may have present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to fill the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress, by the reappointment of Richard Olney, a citizen of Massachusetts.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAND AND PETIT JURIES IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5289) to provide for the selection of grand and petit jurors for the district courts in the Territory of Oklahoma, to report it favorably without amendment. In view of the immediate importance of the legislation requested, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to know what bill it is that has been read. It is impossible to tell what is being read unless we have more order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will explain in a moment the object of the bill. The circuit court of appeals has recently declared in effect that the law authorizing the drawing of jurors in Oklahoma is fatally defective; and there will be no meeting of the legislature of that Territory until a year from now. So the defects can not be cured by the Territory at this time, and the terms of the court are about coming on. This is a House bill providing for the drawing of juries in the Territory of Oklahoma until such time as their legislature shall otherwise provide.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to the bill; but some time a bill passed in such confusion as oftentimes prevails in the Senate will be a bill that ought not to be passed. Nobody could tell from the reading of the pending bill what it contained. I suppose it has been reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate has submitted no written report to accompany the bill, but there was a written report submitted by the committee in the House of Representatives showing the facts of the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CARS IN RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be instructed to send to the Senate information on the following points:

1. How many accidents involving loss of life or injury to postal clerks have occurred on the railways of the United States during each of the last five years, giving the number killed, seriously injured, and slightly injured.

2. How many postal cars are now in the service built wholly or partly of steel, and what is the percentage of such cars to the whole number in use.

3. Have any such cars built wholly or partly of steel been in wrecks since they have been in use, and what was the result to the occupants in loss of life or injury.

4. How many postal cars now in the service have been running more than ten years.

5. What is the cost of a postal car built according to the most approved type under the specifications of the Railway Mail Service, and how does it compare in price to the old type.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the resolution is self-explanatory, and it will only require probably a brief explanation as to why I introduce it.

I have noticed for years as a newspaper reader that whenever there is a wreck if there is anyone on the train injured it is almost invariably a postal clerk. Occasionally you find that the occupants of the postal car are the only ones injured, because the engineer and fireman, seeing the danger, have had the opportunity to jump, whereas the postal clerk, not knowing that anything was ahead, busy possibly, or else tired and sitting down, has his first notice of the trouble by the power which will knock his life out or break his limbs or injure him otherwise.

In reading the report of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service my attention was directed to the fact that there are now being substituted cars built partly of steel, which are of such a character as not to be telescoped at all, something along the line of the Pullman car, and it has occurred to me it would be a good thing to have the information, that we might determine whether or not it is not due these important and hard-working servants of the people who handle our mails on the railway post-offices to hurry up the substitution of life-saving cars in place of the rattletrap affairs now being run on the roads.

That is all the object I had in introducing the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that he use the word "directed" instead of "instructed."

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing. They are words so nearly alike that if one suits the Senator from Iowa better than the other I am perfectly willing.

Mr. ALLISON. We have a form which is usually adopted, although either word would be perfectly proper.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well; insert the word "directed" instead of "instructed." It is entirely immaterial to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be modified as suggested.

Mr. KEAN. Let the resolution be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. It has been suggested to me by a brother Senator that it might be well to amend the resolution by inquiring the relative age of all the postal cars. I understand some of them have been running thirty years.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator wish to modify his resolution?

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have it amended so as to get that information in addition to the rest. Let us get it all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator will state the modification he desires, it will be read from the desk.

Mr. TILLMAN. The clerks can incorporate it at the proper point. Just simply add, after "running more than ten years," the words "and state the length of service such cars have had."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS ACTION.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislatures thereof," and that "each Senator shall have one vote;" and

Whereas each Senator, before assuming the duties of his office, is required to solemnly swear or affirm that he "will support and defend the Constitution of the United States, and that he will faithfully discharge the duties of the office upon which he is about to enter;" and

Whereas, because it was currently reported that one or more Democratic Senators might vote upon certain matters pending before the Senate contrary to the views of a majority of the body of Democratic

Senators, the Democratic Senators were called to caucus upon such matters; and

Whereas it was found at such caucus that said reports were correct, and that certain Democratic Senators might or would vote contrary to the views of said majority; and

Whereas thereupon the following resolutions were presented and adopted by more than two-thirds of the Senators present at said caucus:

"Resolved, That the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Santo Domingo, now pending before the Senate.

"Resolved, That if two-thirds of this caucus shall vote in favor of the foregoing resolution it shall be the duty of every Democratic Senator to vote against the ratification of the said treaty;" and

Whereas the apparent purpose of said resolutions and action was to improperly induce or coerce Democratic Senators who might believe that the best interests of the country required the ratification of said treaty, and because thereof held it to be their duty to vote for its ratification, into disregarding that part of their oaths in which they declared that they would faithfully discharge the duties of the office of Senator: Therefore, be it

Resolved, First. That such action by the said or any other caucus is in plain violation of the spirit and intent of the Constitution of the United States.

Second. That for two-thirds or any other number of the Senators of any party to meet and declare that "it shall be the duty" of any Senator to vote upon any question other than as his own convictions impel him is a plain violation of the manifest intent and spirit of the Constitution all have sworn to uphold and defend.

Third. That the "one vote" the Constitution declares each Senator shall have is his own vote and not the vote of any other or of any number of other Senators, and for a Senator to cast that "one vote" against his convictions of right and duty in the premises is to disfranchise his State in the Senate and to deprive it of the representation in that body the Constitution provides it shall have.

Fourth. That when any number of Senators by combination or otherwise undertake, through any species of coercion, to induce other Senators to vote except as their judgments and consciences tell them, it is an invasion of the rights of a State to equal representation with other States in the Senate, and is subversive of their rights to equal representation and the votes of its Senators in the Senate that the Constitution has provided for.

Fifth. That the Senator who permits any body of other Senators to declare and define for him what his duty is in the matter of his vote in the Senate, and who casts his vote in response to such interference, votes not as a Senator from his own State, but as a Senator from the other States, and he augments the power of the other States beyond that permitted by the Constitution and weakens and degrades the power of his own State in the Senate, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

Sixth. That for any Senator to vote except as his judgment and sense of duty under his oath of office requires is to degrade the high office of Senator and to assail the dignity and standing of the Senate of the United States—qualities possessed in such high degree by no other legislative body in the world.

Mr. PATTERSON and Mr. TILLMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] is recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely want to know what is the parliamentary status. Is it a question of personal privilege?

Mr. PATTERSON. No; it is a resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I object to its consideration this morning, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I have had no idea of asking for its consideration this morning. It is a resolution that will not be hurt by standing over, and I ask that it lie over until to-morrow, when, at the close of the morning business, I shall address the Senate upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

GEOLOGY AND RESOURCES OF SHOSHONE RESERVATION.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish to the Senate such information relating to the geology and the natural resources of that portion of the Shoshone Reservation which is to be opened for settlement in July, 1906, as may be in the possession of the Geological Survey.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 8107. An act extending the public-land laws to certain lands in Wyoming was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 26th ultimo, approved and signed the act (S. 2159) authorizing the Jasper and Eastern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to construct and operate a railroad bridge across the Sabine River, in the States of Texas and Louisiana.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had, on the 27th ultimo, approved and signed the act (S. 321) to provide for the extension of time within which homestead settlers may establish their residence upon certain lands which were heretofore a part of the Uinta Indian Reservation, within the counties of Uinta and Wasatch, in the State of Utah.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed, and the Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

The bill (S. 2165) extending the provisions of the pension laws of the United States to persons engaged in the operation and construction of military telegraph lines during the war of the rebellion was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that that bill may go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as we are on the Calendar, I ask that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 16, being the bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army, which has been heretofore read.

Mr. LODGE. Why not go through the Calendar regularly? It is very short.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill referred to by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] was passed over under objection the other day without prejudice. Is there objection to its consideration at this time?

Mr. LODGE. Why should we not follow the regular order and go through the Calendar in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request.

Mr. LODGE. I think we had better proceed with the Calendar in regular order.

IMPORTATION OF UNWHOLESOME TEA.

The bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importations of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897, was announced as next in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been heretofore read.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is interested in that bill. I do not see him present, and therefore I suggest that the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that that bill may go over without prejudice, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

GEORGETOWN HEIGHTS PARK.

The bill (S. 54) to provide a public park on Georgetown Heights, in the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have some amendments which I desire to offer to the bill. In section 1, page 1, line 4, after the word "acquire," I move to insert "for a park."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 1, line 4, after the word "acquire," it is proposed to insert "for a park;" so as to make the section read:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to acquire for a park, by purchase or condemnation, the tract of land known as Montrose, lying immediately north of Road or U street and east of Lovers lane, on Georgetown Heights, containing 16 acres, more or less, at an expense not exceeding $150,000; and for that purpose the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated, payable one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now move to strike out section 2 of the bill and to insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 2 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That said tract of land when acquired shall be forever held and used as a park for the recreation and pleasure of the people.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. That if the Commissioners of the District of Columbia can not purchase said tract of land at the price hereinbefore stated they are hereby authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, by petition, particularly describing the lands to be taken, a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for said park.

SEC. 3. That of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the said park as herein provided, such amount thereof shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land abutting on said park and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the said park as said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited; and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from said park as aforesaid: Provided, That if the aggregate amount of the benefits to be assessed, as determined by said jury pursuant to the provisions hereof, is less than one-half of the amount of damages awarded for and in respect of the land condemned, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, reject the award and assessment of said jury, and all proceedings hereunder shall be null and void.

SEC. 4. That the said court shall cause public notice of not less than ten days to be given of the filing of said proceedings, by advertisement, in such manner as the court shall prescribe, which notice shall warn all persons having any interest in the proceedings to attend court at a day to be named in said notice and to continue in attendance until the court shall have made its final order ratifying and confirming the award of damages and assessment of benefits of the jury; and in addition to such public notice said court, whenever in its judgment it is practicable to do so, may cause a copy of said notice to be served by the marshal of the District of Columbia, or his deputies, upon such owners of the land to be condemned as may be found by said marshal or his deputies within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That after the return of the marshal and the filing of proof of publication of the notice provided for in the preceding section, said court shall cause a jury of seven judicious, disinterested men, not related to any person interested in the proceedings, and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned by the marshal of the District of Columbia, to which jurors said court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned nor are in any way related to the parties interested therein, and that they will, without favor or partiality, to the best of their judgment, assess the damages each owner of land taken may sustain by reason of the acquisition of said park and the condemnation of lands for the purposes of said park and assess the benefits resulting therefrom as hereinbefore provided. The court, before accepting the jury, shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power to decide upon all such objections and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury, when empaneled, to be filled; and after said jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed the premises, said jury shall proceed, in the presence of the court, if the court shall so direct, or otherwise, as the court may direct, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the District of Columbia and by any person or persons having any interest in the proceedings for the acquisition of said park.

When the hearing is concluded, the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to said court, in writing, its verdict of the amount to be found due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the acquisition of said park under the provisions thereof, and of the pieces or parcels of land benefited by such park and the amount of the assessment for such benefits against the same.

SEC. 6. That if the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury, in determining its value, shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the establishment of said park, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against such part of such piece or parcel of land as may not be taken as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 7. That the court shall have power to hear and determine any objections which may be filed to said verdict or award, and to set aside and vacate the same, in whole or in part, when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, and in such event a new jury shall be summoned, who shall proceed to assess the damages or benefits, as the case may be, in respect of the land as to which the verdict may be vacated, as in the case of the first jury: Provided, That if vacated in part, the residue of the verdict and award as to the land condemned or assessed shall not be affected thereby: And provided further, That the exceptions or objections to the verdict or award shall be filed within thirty days after the return of such verdict and award.

SEC. 8. That when the verdict of said jury shall have been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the amounts of money awarded and adjudged to be payable for lands taken under the provisions hereof shall be paid to the owners of said land by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia from moneys advanced to him by the Secretary of the Treasury upon requisitions of the Commissioners of said District, as provided by law; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated, one half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 9. That when confirmed by the court the several assessments herein provided to be made shall severally be a lien upon the land assessed, and shall be collected as special-improvement taxes in the District of Columbia, and shall be payable in five equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from and after sixty days after the confirmation of the verdict and award. In all cases of payments, the accounting officers shall take into account the assessment for benefits and the award for damages, and shall pay only such part of said award in respect of any lot as may be in excess of the assessment for benefits against the part of such lot not taken, and there shall be credited on said assessment the amount of said award not in excess of said assessment. That said court may allow amendments in form or substance in any petition, process, record, or proceeding, or in the description of property proposed to be taken, or of property assessed for benefits, whenever such amendments will not interfere with the substantial rights of the parties interested.

SEC. 10. That each juror shall receive as compensation the sum of $5 per day for his services during the time he shall be actually engaged in such services under the provisions hereof.

SEC. 11. That the sum of $300 is hereby appropriated to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, one half payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 12. That no appeal by any interested party from the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming the assessment or assessments of benefits or damages herein provided for, nor any other proceeding at law or in equity by such party against the confirmation of such assessment or assessments, shall delay or prevent the payment of awards to others in respect to the property condemned, nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property, sought to be condemned, nor the opening of such park: Provided, however, That upon the final determination of said appeal or other proceeding at law or in equity, the amount found to be due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the acquisition of said park under the provisions hereof shall be paid as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 13. That said tract of land when acquired shall be forever held and used as a park for the recreation and pleasure of the people.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole on the 25th of January, and then read in full.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AFFAIRS OF MOROCCO.

The resolution submitted by Mr. BACON January 8, 1906, requesting the President to furnish the Senate with copies of papers relating to the holding of a conference on matters relating to Morocco, etc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 577) granting to the State of Idaho 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Idaho State Soldiers and Sailors' Home was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that bill may go over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without losing its place on the Calendar. The next bill on the Calendar, being the bill S. 608, granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, is of the same character and will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

FRENCH TRANSATLANTIC CABLE COMPANY.

The bill (S. 2872) for the relief of the French Trans-Atlantic Cable Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the French Trans-Atlantic Cable Company $77,712 for expenses incurred in repairing the company's cables and property damaged by the United States military forces in 1898, during the war between the United States and Spain.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC LANDS ACCOUNTS.

The bill (S. 311) regulating the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the several States relative to the disposition of the public lands, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. That seems to be rather an elaborate bill, Mr. President, and I suggest that it had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask that it may retain its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

AGREEMENT WITH KLAMATH INDIANS.

The bill (S. 1794) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that that bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

EXPENSES OF TRIAL OF INDIANS.

The bill (S. 2783) to repeal section 11 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEAN. What is the act which is referred to?

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the report may be read, Mr. President. That will explain the matter fully, I presume.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. CLAPP January 15, 1906, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill S. 2783, having considered the same, recommends its passage without amendment.

In support of the foregoing recommendation the committee transmits the following letter from the Attorney-General, which is made a part hereof:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 4, 1905.

SIR: Herewith inclosed is a draft of a proposed bill to repeal section 11 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes."

By section 9 of the act "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," Indians committing certain offenses within the Territories or within a State became subject to the laws of the Territory or the State, as the case might be.

Under section 11 of the above-mentioned act, making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, the expenses incident to the trial of Indians under the provisions of said section 9 became payable by the United States.

An early repeal of said section 11 is strongly recommended. This Department, as well as the accounting officers of the Treasury, have had very unsatisfactory experiences with the accounts of expenses incurred by Territorial or county officers under the provisions of said section. Such officers are in no way under the control of this Department or of the officers of the United States. The accounts rendered have been in very unsatisfactory form, and are frequently rendered years after the expenses were incurred, so that the appropriations from which the expenses would have been paid if the accounts had been promptly rendered have been covered into the Treasury. The expenses charged against the United States in such cases have been unnecessarily large. Furthermore, expenses which should be paid by the Territory may be charged against the United States, or the same expenses may be charged both against the Territory or a county thereof and against the United States. It is insisted, as a general rule, that expenses which can not be controlled by the United States or by its officers should not be paid by the United States.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the bill is a very proper one and that it ought to pass; but its language ought to be amended. It now reads:

That section 11 of the act above mentioned be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

But the act is only mentioned in the title of the bill. The bill ought to read:

That section 11 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I move to amend the bill by making it read in that way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. If I understood the reading of the report, there seems to be a difference as to date of the act therein named and the act referred to in the bill.

Mr. GAMBLE. If there be any objection to the bill, perhaps it had better be passed over without prejudice, as the chairman of the committee is not at present in the Chamber, and we can return to it later.

Mr. LODGE. I think the bill is all right, Mr. President, as it has been amended.

Mr. CLAPP. As I have just entered the Chamber, may I ask what is the nature of the amendment which has been agreed to?

Mr. LODGE. The language of the bill refers to "the act above mentioned" without stating what the act is. The amendment which has been agreed to simply recites the description in the body of the bill which is contained in the title.

Mr. CLAPP. That is right.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY DIRECTOR E. B. ROGERS.

The bill (S. 2262) for the relief of Pay Director E. B. Rogers, United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to E. B. Rogers, pay director, United States Navy, $1,000, to be in full for all losses of personal property incurred by him by reason of the destruction by fire of the Windsor House, at Yokohama, Japan, on the morning of February 8, 1886.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDALS OF HONOR TO NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

The bill (S. 697) providing for the award of medals of honor to certain officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps was announced as next in order.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know whether I correctly understood the reading of that bill, but, if I understood it, the bill provides for the issuing of medals to those who have served with merit otherwise than in battle. Is that the fact?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I should like some one to tell me what the character of the service would be?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A report accompanies the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read, Mr. President.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to hear the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. BURROWS January 16, 1906, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 697) providing for the award of medals of honor to certain officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill has the approval of the Navy Department, as will appear by the following communication:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 5, 1905.

SIR: On January 28, 1905, at the suggestion of the Admiral of the Navy, this Department transmitted the draft of a measure providing for the awarding of medals of honor to officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps who, by special acts of valor or by conspicuous gallantry or merit, may deserve such recognition. This measure was introduced by you January 31, 1905, as S. 6970, and, it is understood, was passed by the Senate (February 8, 1905), although it was not acted upon by the House.

Under the provisions of the act of July 12, 1862, as amended by the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. L., pp. 623, 624, and 751), medals of honor are awarded to officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates in the Army. By section 1407 of the Revised Statutes and the act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. L., p. 1099), it is provided that enlisted men of the Navy may be given medals for gallantry. There is, however, no general statute authorizing the bestowal of medals of honor on officers of the Navy.

Appreciating the appropriateness and the justice of the suggestion made by the Admiral of the Navy that this omission, which does not appear to have been the result of any legislative intent, be corrected, the attention of the committee is again invited to this measure with a view to its favorable consideration at the present session.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES J. BONAPARTE, Secretary.

HON. EUGENE HALE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

A like bill passed the Senate in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. TELLER. We are proceeding under the five-minute rule, and as I think the bill is of some importance, I shall object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

EXISTING STATUS IN SANTO DOMINGO.

Senate resolution No. 39, requesting the President to give information to the Senate regarding the existing status in Santo Domingo, etc., was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the resolution may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

CONTRACTS WITH THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 69) regulating the retent on contracts with the District of Columbia was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. FORAKER subsequently said: Has Calendar No. 411 been reached? I have been sitting here very patiently listening——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The statehood bill was reached and passed over under objection.

Mr. FORAKER. It was reached on the Calendar, and I think it is due to all interested in the measure to know what is desired, especially as to the time of taking a vote.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FORAKER. I merely wish to say one thing. I was sitting here listening for the call of the Clerk, and I did not hear the bill called at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So was I.

Mr. FORAKER. Did the Senator from Indiana hear it?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not, and I was not apprised of it, and that is the reason why I immediately called the Senator's attention to the fact that it——

Mr. FORAKER. Who did hear? I want to know who did hear?

Mr. LODGE. I heard it, and I objected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I heard it, and I shall object now, if necessary.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I had expected that the bill would be taken up to-day and read, and then I expected to prefer a request that a time be fixed, any reasonable date in the future, for a vote on the bill.

Mr. LODGE. It is out of the question to fix a time now for a vote on that bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before we discuss it.

Mr. FORAKER. I only want to say that I have no objection to the Senator from Indiana being allowed a certain date on which to take a vote on this measure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is what I have understood.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to be put in the attitude of obstructing the measure. Newspaper articles are being sent to me—I received one yesterday—to the effect that I am going to resort to every kind of obstructive tactics to defeat the measure. I never did resort to obstructive tactics to defeat any measure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am sure——

Mr. FORAKER. All that I have wanted, since this bill is where it might be regularly reached, is that it might be considered to such extent as Senators desire to consider it. I do not know that I will take occasion to say anything at all on the subject. That depends upon what may be said on the other side. I am opposed to the measure as it passed the House. I have presented some amendments which at the proper time I wish to offer. It would be some relief if we knew when the Senate will vote on it, because we could then put it aside until that time. I wish to have it understood that I do not want to delay an hour the vote on the bill at any time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As I said, it was my expectation when the bill was reached on the Calendar to-day to ask that it be read for to-day at least. I had understood that no objection could prevail against the mere reading of the bill when it was reached on the Calendar, and that much, then, would have been out of the way.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will say to the Senator from Indiana that the bill was reached in the regular order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I understand that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was distinctly reported by the Secretary, and objection was interposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The rule permits objection to be made under such circumstances. By Rule VIII, under which the Senate is proceeding, it is provided that—

> At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless, upon motion, the Senate at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of bills and resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand how the bill was reached and how it was disposed of. I have no complaint of the rule or of its disposition thereunder. Both the Senator from Ohio and I chanced to be engaged in conversation and did not hear the bill called. I thought there were two or three bills yet remaining before it would come up. I do not understand that the rule which the Chair has read, with which I was more or less familiar, precludes the mere reading of the bill when reached on the Calendar.

I wish to state further that after reading the bill I was then going to ask the Senate if a day in the future, near or remote, could not be agreed upon for the final disposition of the measure; and I had been assured that perhaps there would be no objection to that request. But since there is, the incident for to-day, I suppose, is closed.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say the rule is absolutely clear. Objection can be interposed at any stage, before the reading or after the reading. I interposed the objection before the reading because I was certain that the bill could not be disposed of now, and to take the time necessary to read so long a bill would simply interfere with the passage of other and unobjected bills which could be disposed of in the morning hour.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is all right.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to say one word further. As the Senator from Indiana is well aware, I am in favor of his bill as it stands—thoroughly in favor of it—but it is impossible to take up a bill of that kind, which is disputed and will lead to debate, and agree upon a time to vote on it when we have not yet even made it the unfinished business—when it has never even been taken up by the Senate. It seems to me we must dispose of these things in order.

Mr. FORAKER. I am perfectly familiar with the rule, and nobody is quarreling with the rule, but it is the general practice of the Senate that the Senator who is known to have a measure in charge will ask that it go over, if he so desires, and that other Senators will await his pleasure to make that request.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. FORAKER. I mean wait until he has had an opportunity when the case is reached on the call of the Calendar.

The Senator from Indiana says I was engaged in conversation at that time, and so was he; and I am reminded by that of an incident which I do not want to apply to this case, but I can not refrain from telling about it. I have had my pocket picked but once, and after it was done I recalled that somebody engaged me in conversation just at that moment. [Laughter.]

I only want to take advantage of the opportunity to let it be known to Senators and everybody else that I have no disposition either to obstruct this measure or to hurry it. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Indiana shall have a convenient time in which to bring it before the Senate. If he wants to debate it, well and good. If he does not, and wants a vote, and will ask for it, I shall be willing, so far as I am concerned, to comply with his request to vote to-day, to-morrow, or any other time, as soon as he pleases.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There was no disposition to prefer an unusual request to the Senate, but there was and is a disposition to ask for the disposition of the measure at as early a date as practicable, and, of course, that was done only after consultation and assurance that no objection would be interposed to fixing a date for a vote upon the bill. Since objection is made to its consideration and it has gone over, of course I will not prefer the request at this time, although I am very anxious to have a vote on the bill at an early day.

PENSIONS TO MILITARY TELEGRAPH EMPLOYEES.

The bill (S. 2165) extending the provisions of the pension laws of the United States to persons engaged in the operation and construction of military telegraph lines during the war of the rebellion was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. SCOTT. I had intended to take this opportunity to submit a few remarks on the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

ARMY DENTAL SURGEONS.

The bill (S. 2355) to regulate the corps of dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department of the Army was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PETTUS subsequently said: The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has withdrawn his objection to Senate bill 2355.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the objection I made a few moments ago.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill. Bills on the line of this one have been approved by every Surgeon-General of the Army for the last nine years. The bill has had the unanimous sanction of the Committee on Military Affairs, so far as I have heard. I will say that this is one of the most modest bills that I have seen introduced in the Senate. The whole idea in the bill is to give rank to the men of this learned profession in the Army, and it is very modest rank at that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from Alabama what is the highest rank that a dental surgeon will receive under the bill?

Mr. PETTUS. The highest rank is major.

Mr. KEAN. From lieutenant up to major?

Mr. PETTUS. There is one major to start with, and captains and lieutenants. That is all the rank they receive. It is all subject to the Surgeon-General of the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

The bill (S. 2787) to amend the act of Congress approved February 11, 1901, entitled "An act providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians of the La Pointe, or Bad River, Reservation in the State of Wisconsin" was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GAMBLE. When this bill was reached on Friday the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] asked that it go over, and I suggest, as he is not present, that it and the next, being the bill (S. 2788) to enable the Indians on the La Pointe, or Bad River, Reservation to obtain title to the lots occupied by them in the village of Odanah, Wis., and to have said village surveyed, and for other purposes, go over, retaining their places on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bills indicated will go over without prejudice, retaining their places on the Calendar.

ADDITIONAL RECORDING DISTRICTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The bill (S. 134) establishing an additional recording district in Indian Territory was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in addition to the places now provided by law for holding courts in the central judicial district of Indian Territory, terms of the district court of the central district shall hereafter be held at the town of Wilburton, and the United States judge of the central district is authorized to establish by metes and bounds a recording district for that court.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report in this case be read, because I see right after it comes another bill for an additional recording district.

Mr. LODGE. It is at another place.

Mr. McCUMBER. The bill provides for two recording districts upon the request of the judge of the United States court there. I do not know that there is any lengthy report with the bill this year. A similar bill passed the Senate during the last session. Both of those bills, in fact, passed the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the bill. I only wanted to know the reason why so many recording districts were being created in the Indian Territory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey withdraw his request for the reading of the report?

Mr. KEAN. I withdraw the request, as the Senator has made a statement on the subject.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 1669) for the establishment of an additional recording district in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was considered as in the Committee of the Whole. It proposes to create in the Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory, an additional recording district to be known as district No. 27.

The bill was ordered to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. HAMMOND.

The bill (S. 290) to amend an act approved March 15, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army," was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

ROBERT W. CALDWELL.

The bill (S. 2625) for the relief of Robert W. Caldwell, First Regiment Ohio Heavy Artillery Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to revoke the order dismissing Robert W. Caldwell from the military service of the United States as a major of the First Regiment of Ohio Heavy Artillery Volunteers, and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of the date of that order.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISSUE OF WARRANTS BY JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

The bill (H. R. 120) to amend section 9 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GAMBLE. Let the bill go over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from South Dakota, the bill will go over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH DAKOTA.

The joint resolution (S. R. 12) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a condemned cannon to the board of regents of the University of South Dakota, at Vermilion, S. Dak., to be placed on the campus of said institution as a memorial to students of said university who served in the Spanish-American war was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end the following proviso:

Provided, That the donation shall be without expense to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out the words, beginning in line 9, "as a memorial to the former students of the university who served in the Army and Navy of the United States during the war with Spain." The cannon is to be left there for all time, and there is certainly no necessity to put those words in the joint resolution.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment. I simply followed the form used in other joint resolutions of this character.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a condemned cannon to the board of regents of the University of South Dakota, at Vermilion, S. Dak., to be placed on the campus of said institution."

LICENSE TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (H. R. 9757) to amend paragraph 34 of section 7 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the paragraph by adding thereto the following:

Persons licensed to store or sell kerosene or oils of like grade, or explosives of any kind, shall pay a license tax of $1 per annum for each permit issued; for storing or selling fireworks the license tax shall be 50 cents per annum for each permit issued; for storing or selling gasoline or oils of like grade the license tax shall be $5 per annum for each permit issued: Provided, That persons paying a license tax as fuel hucksters shall not be required to pay an additional tax for storing or selling such articles.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF TWENTY-THIRD STREET NW.

The bill (S. 133) authorizing the joining of Twenty-third street NW. and Kalorama avenue was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out sections 1 and 2 of the bill, in the following words:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to join Twenty-third street NW. to Kalorama avenue (a distance of about 200 feet) through lot 1, block 20, Kalorama Heights subdivision, and lots 9, 10, and 24, L. R. Tuttle's subdivision. Said Commissioners shall, within thirty days from the passage of this act, institute, by petition particularly describing the lands to be taken, proceedings in rem in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, holding a district court for the United States for said District, for the condemnation of said lands necessary for the joining of Twenty-third street NW. and Kalorama avenue.

SEC. 2. That of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the joining of Kalorama avenue and Twenty-third street as herein provided, such amount thereof shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided for as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said streets as joined, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the joining of said streets as said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited, and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from the joining of said streets as aforesaid: Provided, That if the aggregate amount of the benefits to be assessed, as determined by said jury pursuant to the provisions hereof, is less than one-half of the amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land condemned, the Commissioners of the District of Columba may, in their discretion, reject the award and assessment of said jury, and all proceedings hereunder shall be null and void.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That within sixty days after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, by petition, particularly describing the lands to be taken, a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Twenty-third street NW. from U street to Kalorama road, so as to include so much of lots 9 and 24, L. R. Tuttle's subdivision, and lots 1 and 18, block 20, Kalorama Heights subdivision, as lie between two parallel curved lines 50 feet apart, the easterly of which begins at a point on north line of lot 9, L. R. Tuttle's subdivision, and 50 feet easterly from the northwest corner thereof, and which passes thence in a southeasterly direction on a circular arc with a radius of 512 feet, more or less, to a point on the west line of lot 24 of said subdivision, and 55 feet, more or less, from the southwestern corner of said lot.

SEC. 2. That the entire amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the extension of Twenty-third street, as herein provided, shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided for as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said street as extended, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the extension of said street, as said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited; and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from the extension of said street as aforesaid; and the verdict of said jury shall also be for a sufficient sum to cover all the costs of the condemnation proceedings herein provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page, 5, line 10, to strike out "joining" and insert "extension;" in line 11, to strike out "streets" and insert "street;" in line 12, to strike out "joining" and insert "extension;" in line 24, to strike out "joining" and insert "extension;" in line 25, to strike out "streets" and insert "street;" on page 6, line 3, to strike out "joining" and insert "extension;" in the same line, to strike out "streets" and insert "street;" and in line 5, to strike out "joining" and insert "extension;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That after the return of the marshal and the filing of proof of publication of the notice provided for in the preceding section, said court shall cause a jury of seven judicious, disinterested men, not related to any person interested in the proceedings, and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned by the marshal of the District of Columbia, to which jurors said court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned nor are in any way related to the parties interested therein, and that they will, without favor or partiality, to the best of their judgment, assess the damages each owner of land taken may sustain by reason of the extension of said street, and the condemnation of lands for the purpose of such extension, and assess the benefits resulting therefrom as hereinbefore provided. The court, before accepting the jury, shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power to decide upon all such objections, and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury, when impaneled, to be filled; and after said jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed the premises, said jury shall proceed, in the presence of the court, if the court shall so direct, or otherwise as the court may direct, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the District of Columbia and by any person or persons having any interest in the proceedings for the extension of said street. When the hearing is concluded the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to said court, in writing, its verdict of the amount to be found due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said street under the provisions thereof, and of the pieces or parcels of land benefited by such extension, and the amount of the assessment for such benefits against the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 6, line 10, to strike out "joining" and insert "extension;" and in line 11, to strike out "streets" and insert "street;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That if the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury, in determining its value, shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the extension of said street or highway, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against such part of such piece or parcel of land as may not be taken as hereinbefore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 7, line 7, after the word "land," to strike out the words "by the Treasurer of the United States, ex officio commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, upon the warrant of the Commissioners of said District, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," and to insert "by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia from moneys advanced to him by the Secretary of the Treasury upon requisitions of the Commissioners of the said District, as provided by law; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That when the verdict of said jury shall have been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the amounts of money awarded and adjudged to be payable for lands taken under the provisions hereof shall be paid to the owners of said land by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, page 9, line 6, to strike out "opening" and insert "extension;" in the same line to strike out "streets" and insert "street;" in line 10 to strike out "joining" and insert "extension;" and in the same line to strike out "streets" and insert "street;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That no appeal by any interested party from the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming the assessment or assessments of benefits or damages herein provided for, nor any other proceeding at law or in equity by such party against the confirmation of such assessment or assessments, shall delay or prevent the payment of award to others in respect to the property condemned, nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property sought to be condemned, nor the extension of such street: Provided, however, That upon the final determination of said appeal or other proceeding at law or in equity the amount found to be due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said street under the provisions hereof shall be paid as hereinbefore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the extension of Twenty-third street NW. to Kalorama road."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This completes the Calendar.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may now be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate at any length upon this subject. I have no desire to discuss the pending measure for the purpose of delaying it. I stated the other day that I was ready to vote upon it, and I am ready to vote upon it whenever the Senate is ready; and although I made some objection the other day, I shall make no further objection if the Senator from New Hampshire chooses to ask for a time to be fixed for the final vote that will give Senators who desire to speak an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Alger	Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough	Perkins
Allee	Clarke, Ark.	Hopkins	Pettus
Allison	Clay	Kean	Piles
Ankeny	Culberson	Kittredge	Proctor
Bacon	Dick	La Follette	Rayner

Brandegee	Dubois	Long	Simmons
Bulkeley	Flint	McCreary	Smoot
Burnham	Frazier	Martin	Sutherland
Burrows	Frye	Nelson	Teller
Carter	Fulton	Nixon	Warner
Clark, Mont.	Gallinger	Overman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The senior Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when the bill was before the Senate the last time the Senator who has it in charge alleged that the reclamation act was a pure and simple subsidy measure, as I understood him. I have not looked at the RECORD, but that is my recollection of the statement he made.

I wish to say a few words about the reclamation act. I do not mean to say—I have not said and I shall not say—that Congress may not, at the proper time, grant a bounty, a pure and simple bounty, to some enterprise. There have been so many precedents made that it is too late for any man to contest that question. He might question the propriety of it, but the power has been pretty well established by the custom Congress has established.

But the reclamation act has not been in any sense considered as a bounty. The Government of the United States is, I presume, the greatest landholder in the world. At all events, the Government of the United States is the holder of an immense area in the West, west of the Mississippi River at least, that is called the "arid region." Some of it is designated as semiarid. By that, I suppose, it is meant regions in the West that can be cultivated in some way without water, while the arid region is practically that which we have considered a desert unless water could be obtained.

I have not stopped to figure up or to determine exactly what is the area of arid land, but the published statements of the Department having charge of the subject have declared repeatedly that the arid region is two-fifths of the United States. Whether in that they take in some portions of the country that may not be considered entirely arid I do not know, but there are certainly two-fifths of the United States that will be benefited by the use of water for irrigation.

Now, the Government owns in the Western States immense areas that never can be sold or utilized, in my judgment, without some irrigating system. While in some of the States, like Nebraska, Kansas, and eastern Colorado, there is a considerable area of country that may be occupied by farms, and farming may be done with perhaps as much profit as it may be done in some of the New England States, if water could be put upon that very same land you could more than double the productive capacity of the land.

The Government proposes to take this land that belongs to itself, put it under water, sell it when it gets through to the farmers who wish it, charging them the entire amount of money that may be expended on the land, and give the farmer ten years to pay for it. To the extent that no interest is charged, that may be considered a benefaction to the West, and beyond that there is no benefaction in it whatever.

In the first place, the money that is to be expended is money that is paid for land. It is money the settler has paid to the Government for land that, according to my theory of government, belongs to the men who are willing to occupy it.

I do not think the Government made any greater mistake in its history anywhere, or at any time, than it did when the land was held and disposed of for revenue to the Government itself. Had the Government determined when the country was new that no land should be the subject of individual proprietorship except it was accompanied by cultivation and occupation, and then in a limited quantity, as the homestead act of 1862 provided, this country would have been in a very much better condition, although the Government would have been out the dollar and a quarter an acre, or the two dollars and a half an acre, whatever it might have received from it.

There are, perhaps, two excuses why the Government did not do that. In the first place, the Government of the United States was poor and needed the money and the land was considered a source of revenue, as it turned out to be a source of revenue, and a considerable revenue.

Another excuse, perhaps, might be stated to be that the people of the United States had been accustomed to an entirely different system. The land had belonged to the sovereign—to the King of Great Britain, the King of France, or Spain, whoever it might be—claiming ownership of the western lands in this new continent; and they had been in the habit of picking out favorites and giving them a great amount of land, sometimes upon the theory that the favorite would found a colony and sometimes without any such qualification or restriction.

In 1837 the Government found itslef with a surplus of about $35,000,000—somewhere in that neighborhood, perhaps a little less. That surplus was practically derived from the sale of the public lands in the region of country called "the West;" at least it was then called "the West." We included in the West in those days all lying west of the State of Pennsylvania, along the Lakes, Michigan, Ohio, Wisconsin (not yet a Territory, as I recollect), Illinois, and Indiana. All west of the Mississippi River was then practically unoccupied except the State of Missouri, the State of Arkansas, and the State of Louisiana. I do not know what to-day ought to be called "the West." I do not know whether we ought to include anything east of the Mississippi River or not.

Some day when I have an opportunity I may speak of the new West, by which I mean all that lies west of the Mississippi River, but I do not intend to go into that by detailing its productions or its capacity or anything of that kind to-day. I only want to bring it to the attention of the Senate that we in the West have never asked anything of the Government that I think anybody could declare to be unfair. We have never had any bounties. I think you can hardly call a homestead a bounty which was granted to a settler who went upon the public lands in that region or even in the regions blessed by rain and sunshine which made it productive. I am sure those who have been brought up in the West or those who went there in their early manhood and have seen the West grow will bear testimony that the man who went out and made a home upon the public lands of the United States was entitled to every thing he got, and, Mr. President, entitled to more than he got.

As I was saying, in 1837 there had been practically derived from the public lands in the States east of the Mississippi River a sum more than the Government then needed for its use. Thereupon the Government of the United States passed a law that the money should be distributed, and it was distributed. Every State that took it did so with a certificate that on demand of the United States they would return it without interest. As I said the other day, not a dollar of that amount, a little over $28,000,000, has ever been returned. Of course I ought to say in good faith in describing this occurrence that the Government at no time ever called upon a State to return it.

As I said the other day, nobody ever expects it to be returned. For myself, I have no hesitation in saying that I should not be a party to the calling upon the governments of the several States to return it. About $380,000 of that went to States west of the Mississippi River—to the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri, they being all the States we then had lying west of the river. All the remainder went to the Eastern and the Middle States, the States that I might call the "old West," east of the river. The other day I called the attention of the Senate to this subject. I am not complaining of that donation, for that is what it is. It was a loan in theory, but a donation in fact.

The Government of the United States has made an appropriation for reclamation purposes by an act which was passed through this body, and, I think, through the other, with a remarkable degree of unanimity. In this body I believe there was not even a roll call upon its passage, and in the other body it passed with such a degree of unanimity that was at least unusual. We in the West are grateful when we get a small favor from outside the West. We are often surprised, and I think that the people in my section of the country were particularly surprised when the passage of that act was announced to them. I do not know of any other section of the country that has up to this hour received any immediate benefit from that act. I believe last summer the Government did open a ditch in the State of Nevada, and I suppose next year there will be water put upon the arid lands of Nevada; but I predict, Mr. President, that the 110,700 square miles of that State will, under the beneficent influence of that act, ultimately become not a State to be treated as a rotton borough, not as a State to be sneered at, but that it will become a great agricultural State, as it has been one of the great mining States of this country, and will continue to be so in the future.

The Government has an enterprise in Colorado. The Government has commenced the construction of a tunnel two and a quarter miles long through a mountain so high that no water can be carried over it. The tunnel will open into a valley with a sufficient amount of water to reimburse the Government for every dollar that it will put into the tunnel and the ditches to distribute the water. Before the Government began the work, or put a dollar on the tunnel, it had secured from the residents of that valley a sufficient amount of pledges, of bonds, from the men who own the land that it is to be watered to reimburse the Government, even if the Government never sold an acre of this land; and it has thousands and tens of thousands of acres that will eventually be made worth what the work costs, and in addition as much as the price would be if the land was within the rain belt instead of in the arid region.

I can not conceive, Mr. President, that there is any analogy between that act on the part of the Government and the shipping bill. The Government has parted with a great quantity of its land in the West for railroad enterprises. Mr. President, I was in the West before an acre of that land was donated or pledged to railroads, and I must say that, if I had had my way, I would not have voted an acre of public land as a donation to a railroad. It would have been infinitely better if the Government of the United States had taken the money from the Treasury and paid it to the railroads, and saved the land for its own use and disposition to the settlers of the country. But the Government determined not to lose anything in that enterprise. It immediately increased the price of the public land from $1.25 an acre, at which it had been formerly, to $2.50 in the section of country which came within its railroad grants. So we have more than paid, not perhaps for all the railroads, but we have paid so much toward their construction that the Government has not lost anything on its railroad assistance.

I do not think that any Senator can ask me to vote for the pending bill because he or the Senators from any other section voted for the reclamation bill. The reclamation bill, Mr. President, is of no more interest to me, living in the West, than it is to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who lives in the East. The time has now come when the young men and young women in Massachusetts, in Maine, in New Hampshire, in Vermont, in Connecticut, in New York, and in Pennsylvania, when they become of age, do not find the opportunities there which their fathers found; and the population of the great West has been largely made up of New England's sons and daughters and the sons and daughters of Pennsylvania and New York, who, not finding opportunities as great as they wished in their native States, have gone West to make homes; who took Greeley's advice, "Go west, young man; go west." They have gone west, Mr. President, by the thousands and tens of thousands, until to-day west of the Mississippi there is found more than one-fifth of the entire population of the United States.

Mr. President, all sections of the country are interested in the reclamation service. Its advantages are as open to the children of New England and New York as they are to those of Colorado, of Wyoming, of Idaho, or of Montana. They go there and take the lands upon the same terms that we take them, and, Mr. President, we are anxious to see them come. As I said the other day, we have found them good citizens and useful members of society, and they are as much entitled as are the sons of the West to great credit for the growth, the prosperity, and the moral worth and stamina of those western communities. I remember, however, to have heard that section of the country spoken of by high authority as "the undesirable communities of the United States;" but, Mr. President, if they are undesirable communities, they are the undesirable citizens of the East who have come to us, for they compose the great bulk of our population. I do not mean to say that we have not some foreigners, but we have proportionately a greater American population than have many of the Eastern States. The best class of foreigners which come to this country find their way into the great West. They are not the class that lodge in the cities of the East; they are not the class that are found in the near Atlantic ports. They are those who have the enterprise and the vigor to go west, to go into new communities, and to better their condition in that way.

I am as anxious to see the commerce of the United States carried in American bottoms as is anybody else, provided it can be carried as cheaply in American bottoms as it can in any other way. There is a benefit, perhaps, that might offset something as against the fact that it is not carried quite as cheaply in American bottoms; there is some advantage under this bill which, I think, will be given to us in its first section; that is the provision for the naval reserve. I know that if we want men to man our ships in time of war and if we want our transportation done in time of war it will be some benefit if we can have American ships for that transportation. All the Senator from New Hampshire has to do, in my judgment, to secure the passage of such a bill is to show that the bounty or donation or subsidy—whatever you choose to call it—will bring to the American people benefits of sufficient character to warrant the expenditure of the money. I can not see where the Senator has made such a case in the report of the committee, and I have not been convinced from any arguments made on the floor that such will be the fact.

I do not know that I adequately appreciate what this bill will cost. I have read the report with care. Since the report was made, however, there has been a decided change in the bill, and the feature of it which it was supposed would bring some revenue to the Government by way of a tax on tonnage—which I think was of doubtful value, but which would have had the merit at least of reducing the total amount that the Government would expend by way of bounties to these ships—has, as I understand, been stricken from the bill.

I thought I heard the Senator from New Hampshire say the other day before the bill was modified that in ten years it was estimated there would be—I think he said—about $40,000,000 all told. I make the amount much larger. Certainly if we do not give to this fund the amount that was supposed to come into the Treasury from the tonnage dues, the sum required will be somewhat larger.

I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he is prepared to state what the expenditure will be—I do not, of course, expect him to do that accurately—but has he the estimates, or has he, with his knowledge of the subject, information which will justify him to say what the cost will be at the end of the first ten years and then at the end of the second ten years? I will wait for the Senator's reply, if he chooses to reply to that inquiry.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator, in the first place, that I have never believed that the estimate made in the report was at all accurate; and I am going to be entirely frank in my statement about it.

Mr. TELLER. I believe that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is altogether too high, while the Senator thinks it is too low, as I understood him to say a moment ago.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say to the Senator that really I have not sufficient acquaintance with what would happen so as to judge of the matter; but I have always imagined that most of these estimates were too low and that the result would show an increase instead of a decrease from year to year.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is wrong about that. The Commissioner of Navigation made this estimate at my suggestion. I said to him that I wanted him to make it high enough; that I had no disposition to impose—and I certainly should not, if I knew it—upon the Senate in a matter of this kind. The Commissioner of Navigation estimated that we should have 10,000 naval reserves; that we would establish every one of these mail lines under this bill—of which there is no certainty—and that we would give a very large subvention to the so-called cargo-carrying vessels. The suggestion is made that, by the second year, under this bill, it is believed sufficient new mail steamers will have been constructed to put into operation new mail service that will require an expenditure of $1,500,000. I do not believe that by the second year enough of those steamers can be built, for they will all have to be new steamers, to call for that amount—$1,500,000. The estimate, if the Senator will examine it very carefully, presupposes that three things will happen: First, that we will establish every one of these mail lines in ten years; next, that we will have 10,000 naval reserves in that time, and, third, that we will give to cargo vessels a subvention of $29,250,000.

On that point the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] in his excellent speech took the ground that, in his judgment, we would not succeed in getting any such number of naval volunteers under this bill; and, next, that we would not be able to build many cargo carriers upon the subvention that is allowed in the bill, because it is too small. I believe the Senator did not make any suggestion concerning the mail lines, but I think the Senator will agree with me——

Mr. MALLORY. I did say, Mr. President, that I would favor an increase of the mail subvention so far as the Gulf of Mexico was concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I meant to say was that the Senator did not make any suggestion as to whether or not, in his opinion, the lines would all become established during that period. The Senator will agree with me that that is problematical at best.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. To be entirely frank about the matter, if this estimate of the Commissioner of Navigation, to which I do not fully assent, proves correct, the cost under this bill for ten years will be as follows: Naval reserves, $4,350,000; cargo vessels, $29,250,000; mail subventions, $23,486,250; increased subvention to Oceanic Line, $2,170,000, or a total of $59,256,250.

Mr. TELLER. In ten years?

Mr. GALLINGER. In ten years. As I said a moment ago, I myself do not agree to this. I think it is altogether too large. On two points I want to add a word, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not want to take the Senator's time, of course.

Mr. TELLER. I am only going to speak briefly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to call attention to the fact that the present profit of our ocean mail service just about balances the subventions to these new mail lines. Every other government of which I have any knowledge uses those profits, if they have any, in the development of their merchant marine. We do not; we put the profits in the National Treasury. Of course, that does not change the cost——

Mr. TELLER. The profits have not been great, have they?

Mr. GALLINGER. We have had very large profits.

Mr. FRYE. One million eight hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Nearly $2,000,000 a year.

Mr. TELLER. That heretofore has gone into the Treasury?

Mr. GALLINGER. That goes into the Treasury at the present time. Again, if the provision in the original bill in regard to tonnage taxes should remain, it would produce $15,000,000, or very nearly that.

Mr. TELLER. That provision is out of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is out of the bill. I am going to explain that. If it should go into the bill again before it becomes a law, it would reduce the estimate of the total amount of the cost of the bill to $44,000,000, just above what was suggested in the first place. But I want to emphasize this point, that I think the Senator himself, if he will sit down uninterruptedly and examine the bill and take these approximate estimates made by the Commissioner of Navigation, will see that they are altogether too high. The Senator, I apprehend, does not believe that every one of these mail lines will be established. I myself hope they will be; but it is hardly to be expected that they will all be established. If they are not, of course that will reduce the amount to be paid under the bill. The amount that is estimated for cargo carriers is so much higher than the Senator from Florida thinks it will be that it is startling, and it is very much higher than I believe it will be.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator give us his opinion about it? I should as lief have the Senator's opinion as that of the Commissioner of Navigation, and I think I would a little rather have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, of course the Commissioner's estimate is approximate.

Mr. TELLER. How much would the Senator deduct from the estimate of the Commissioner of Navigation?

Mr. GALLINGER. My judgment is that as the bill stands to-day if during the ten-year period $35,000,000 were expended it would be a fair estimate, but I may be wrong. Perhaps I ought to put it at $40,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. That is an average of about three and a half millions a year?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is.

Mr. TELLER. Well, Mr. President, if this bill is a success, it seems to me from my figures—and I have been trying to figure on it, but I am not very confident so far as my own estimate is concerned—it seems to me that if the bill only requires that amount in ten years it will not be very successful; it will not do very great good to the cargo-carrying trade of this country.

I suppose the purpose of this bill is to secure to American ships the carrying of as many as possible of the products of this country going out and the imports coming in.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. This estimate is entirely theoretical.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I know it.

Mr. FRYE. The more successful the bill, if it becomes a law, the higher the cost.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. If the bill fails to succeed at all, then the cost, perhaps, will suit the Senator from Colorado—and it will not be much, if anything. If, on the contrary, it is a perfect success, then the cost will pay for the success and will be adequate to pay for the success. I myself hope it will cost a good deal more than $50,000,000 in ten years.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Maine assumes, then, that I do not want to increase the commerce in American ships?

Mr. FRYE. No; I assume that the Senator, from his interrogations, does not wish to vote for this bill because it is going to cost a good deal of money.

Mr. TELLER. That is one feature in it. I think sometimes the outlay of a little money is a waste, while the outlay for the same identical purpose of a sufficient amount is very profitable indeed.

Mr. FRYE. I entirely agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. TELLER. That, I think, is a business principle that every business man understands. You may put only such money in an enterprise as to make a failure of it, and you may put a little more or a good deal more in and make it a great success. I myself do not believe a success can be made of this Naval Reserve. I do not think the amount of money provided in the bill to be paid to these sailors will be sufficient to induce such a class of men as we want for sailors to go into the service.

If the naval reserve were provided for in a separate bill, Mr. President, I should not have any hesitation in saying that I thought it an appropriate and proper bill. I could support it, but I would not support it with any enthusiasm if it provided only for the payments that are proposed in the pending bill. They ought to be larger.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me just a word there——

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. My impression is that the pay provided for the Naval Reserves in this bill is the same that Great Britain provides for her naval reserves, and she has found the system a success.

Mr. TELLER. But, Mr. President, the difference in wages and opportunities between this country and Great Britain is so great that, unless you accept a class of men that nobody wants to see in that reserve, I think no comparison can be made. Great Britain might succeed in securing men for her naval reserve by the payment of such a sum. She succeeds in securing men on her ships at very much less than the wages for which we are able to secure men on our ships. Is not that a fact?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; it is.

Mr. TELLER. That has been one of the things, I think, that has been more embarrassing to the effort to build up the carrying of American commerce in American ships than anything else.

There are other methods that we might adopt. I alluded to one the other day, but evidently it does not seem to meet with approbation. I myself believe that if the law provided that every American ship bringing imports into our ports should be given a reduction of the duty on such imports, or, in other words, if it were so arranged that a shipowner bringing in imports should have the benefit of a certain percentage of the customs dues, it would do more to encourage American shipping than this bill. Then a man could take a shipload of goods abroad with a guaranty that he would have no difficulty when he got into the great European ports, or even into South American ports, of finding a return cargo. I understand that is one of the difficulties with which our shipping has to contend. When American vessels go into a port, whether it be Asiatic or European, they find themselves compelled to compete with tramp ships, that can be run much cheaper perhaps, but if they could say to exporters in that country, "If you will send your goods in our ship, we can afford to carry them at the same rate that the foreign ship carries them," very likely they would get their share of the trade. It is possible that they might carry for a little less, if the Government was liberal in that reduction. That plan has always seemed to me to be a proper one. I have heard it discussed here for twenty-five years at least, but yet I have never seen an attempt honestly and vigorously made to secure anything of that kind. I suppose it is because those who are more familiar with the subject doubt whether or not it would succeed. I have never been connected with any branch of the public service that required me to initiate anything of this kind or that would even justify me in initiating it, but I express my opnion that that is one of the ways by which this difficulty could be met.

The other day there was some discussion about the coastwise trade. I have myself never found fault that ships trading from one American port to another should have some preference, but it is not very long since we adopted a new system. We extended the coastwise law to the Philippine Islands. That certainly is not an American trade, whatever the relations of the Philippine Islands may be to us. I think the Supreme Court has established the fact that the ports of the Philippines are not American ports. That can not be questioned. That action gave to American shipping some advantages, but not sufficient, I suppose, to make the slightest difference with the trade. That trade does not amount to anything. We sent over last year about $4,000,000 worth of goods to the Philippine Islands. I suppose half of that amount went there because of the American occupation, and would not have gone if there had not been such occupation. They sent us somewhere between twelve and thirteen million dollars' worth, as I recollect, though I can not speak exactly, because I have not looked up the matter for some time. At any rate, the trade with the Philippines amounts to a sum between seventeen and twenty million dollars—not a very considerable trade—and if the American ships had it all it would not amount to a great deal.

I believe those who have been conversant with affairs over there think that when that act is in full operation it will not benefit the shipowners, because the exports from there will go to other lands and not to ours. The exports that come to us from the Philippine Islands are of a character that can go to any part of the world. They are not specially adapted to our trade and to our demands, and a good deal of the Philippine trade now goes to Europe and comes to us in ships belonging to other nations and not to ours. It goes from the Philippines to Europe in European ships, and in European ships it comes back to us. That will not benefit our shipping interest any.

I do not know but that we might apply the principle of the coastwise trade to some other ports besides the Philippine ports. I suppose it would be difficult to apply it to those of Great Britain. We ship an immense quantity of stuff to Great Britain every year, and I suppose Great Britain would resent it if we provided any method by which her ships could not get into the trade between that country and ours. I do not see that there is any way to do it. I do not know whether there is or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I think under our commercial agreement with Great Britain we could not possibly do that.

Mr. TELLER. My idea is that whenever our necessities require us to modify these commercial relations we can do so, provided we are careful in so doing and do not injure ourselves. When we can get any benefit out of it, we have a right to modify such arrangements or change them at any time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PERKINS. I was going to ask my friend the Senator from Colorado a question, with his permission. His public life has been so identified with the history of our country in matters of legislation during the past forty years that I know of no statesman whose judgment and opinion I hold in higher esteem than I do those of my friend the Senator from Colorado. Therefore I wish to ask him a question.

Until 1855 we had control of the transportation and commerce of the world. Our ships did the business. We would have continued in that business had it not been that Great Britain, Germany, and France have taken it away from us by subventions and subsidies to their shipping. How can we revive that business without a subsidy or subvention similar to those given by foreign nations?

I was much interested in what the Senator said in the beginning of his remarks relative to the reclamation of our arid lands in the West. He says it is not a subsidy. The same rule perhaps applies to our domestic mail matter. We have a deficiency each year of fifteen or twenty million dollars more than we receive in postage. We make it up without a dissenting voice. Is not that a subsidy? Is it not similar to what we are asking in this case—to revive American shipping?

I do not wish to interrupt the Senator; I am asking for information, and I know of no one better equipped with it than is my friend the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from California does not need any information from me on shipping matters. That I know. I do not think there is any analogy between the payment of money to railroads for carrying the mails and the proposition here, except so far as this provides somewhat for the mail. Beyond that there is no analogy. We do have a deficiency in the Postal Department. We have had it ever since I have been in public life. We would not have had a deficiency in the postal revenues if we had confined ourselves to the old idea of carrying the mail to the communities and putting it in post-offices and letting the people come to the post-office and get the mail. But when we out West saw that some little towns in New England—and I could name some of them, not in New Hampshire perhaps, but in New England—were getting their mail five and six times a day, delivered at their doors, our folks said, "That is not fair; we ought to have something." Somebody devised a scheme. I believe it was first put in operation in the East. It is what is called the rural mail delivery. I think we at first made an appropriation of a few hundred thousand dollars for it. I objected to that when it was made.

I was brought up in a country district in the State of New York. We had a little post-office. We had post-offices on both sides of us. You could go to a post-office 2 miles from father's farm; you could go to another 4 miles; you could go to another 6 miles; to another 12 miles, and so on. We got the mail once a week—all that the Department in those days thought necessary. We got the New York papers. If a man was a Democrat, he got the old New York Evening Post. If he was a little off color and did not want to be a full Democrat, he could take the New York Herald. If he was a Whig, he took the Times, or Greeley's paper when that came on. Every Saturday you could go down to the post-office, where there was a store and a blacksmith shop, etc., and you could find probably a dozen or fifteen or twenty boys of the neighborhood, all the way from 10 to 20 years old, who had come in for the mail. It was a delight for the boys to go after the mail. It did not cost anything. They got the newspapers. They had a little social conference with each other around the post-office in the afternoon or along toward night while getting the mail. That condition did not call for any relief by this Government.

Now we are expending $20,000,000 a year for this service. We will expend $50,000,000 per annum in a few years, and the people will be no better off. You can not give to every portion of the country the same advantages that other sections may have and are entitled to. If people live in a town it is to the interest of the Government not to have everybody go to the post-office for the mail, because you would have to provide buildings, appointments, clerks, etc., to handle the mail to such an extent that it is probably better in towns to deliver the mail in the way it is now delivered.

When you put your free-delivery service in a country where there is perhaps upon a quarter section of land a house, and then upon the next section, a mile away, there may be another house, you are doing what you are not required to do. That is one of the leakages and one of the methods by which we are prevented from getting the small postage that some of us at least have hoped to see. I can remember very well when we used to pay 5 cents for a letter. Then it got down to 3 cents, and we thought we had done wonders when the mail came to us for 3 cents. It is now 2 cents, and if we would treat the post-office as it ought to be treated, as it would be treated in the hands of good business men, we could give the mail to the whole country at a cent. I know that this matter is not exactly pertinent to the pending bill.

Some people contend that the Government of the United States ought not to furnish mail to the extreme sections of the country at the same rate that it does to near-by places. I can very well remember when the Government carried mail so many miles for a certain sum, and so many more miles for a certain other sum. That was all abolished years ago. Sensible men said: "You can not do that. Let us wipe it all out and give to the people of the country wherever they are, whether in California or New England, mail at one figure. If there is a man in California whose sons and daughters are in New England, let him send mail to them for the regular uniform rate."

I should like to see the time come when we could send mail all over this country for 1 cent. I do not know that I am especially interested in some features of our present system in the Post-Office. I would not myself, if I had the making of the regulations, make the mail a conveyor of merchandise. I would open it to literature—books, etc.—but I would not open it to merchandise; and I do not think we were called upon to do that. However, this is not the subject I got up to discuss. I have been drawn away to it.

The Senate has stricken out the eighth section of the pending bill, which, if it appropriates at all, should come from the House and not from this body. I myself doubt very much whether it would be a valuable addition to the bill, no matter where it originates. I could readily see that if it was a tax upon foreign ships it might do first rate, but I can not see why we can not legally and properly say—and I do not believe any nation has a right to complain if we do say—that every foreign ship which comes into our ports shall pay a certain tonnage duty, and every American ship that comes in may do just as she does now when she comes from one American port to another—not pay anything.

As I have said, these are matters that have not been turned over to me to look after. I am not on the Committee on Naval Affairs; I am not on the Committee on Commerce; I am not on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I do not have anything to do with those subjects especially.

There is one thing that stares us in the face, and when I shall have referred to it that will be about all I want to say on the subject now. It stares us squarely in the face: Where are you going to get the money to pay, if this is a success, and it runs to five or six or ten million dollars a year? Where is the money coming from? To-day, every month there is a deficit, though not large. Last year it was much larger than it will be this year. Our customs duties this year up to the present time—the year is but little more than half out—are twenty-three or twenty-four million dollars more than they were last year at the same time. That is not an especially inspiring thing to me. I have never been anxious to see the imports to the United States increase very largely.

Our internal-revenue collections this year are in the neighborhood of $10,000,000 more than they were last year for the same length of time. It looks as if the deficiency might be small, but still there is a deficiency, and the deficiency will be increased when the revenues are taken out of the Treasury by the appropriations we are going to make at this session. It is safe to say there will be a deficiency this year, and no matter whether it is small, or more, or large, if it is a dollar, whatever you expend in the shipping business you must provide for. How are you going to provide for it? You can not increase your import duties. To do that would probably lessen the revenues. You may increase the internal-revenue taxes. That nobody would want to do in these days. We have been trying to reduce them. Your land revenues, which used to run from four to ten million dollars, have been devoted by law to a special purpose. Your Government expenses are increasing every year.

The other day we heard a Senator from one of the Western States tell us about the forest reserves which had been created. We began the forest-reserve business as we began the post-office business, by making at first an appropriation of a couple of thousand dollars to look the situation over and see whether the timber in the country was being properly guarded and taken care of; and then a little more and a little more until this year it will be $2,000,000 for forest reserves. It is morally certain that every year you maintain the forest reserves you add to the expense. If it is $2,000,000 this year you may look for $2,500,000 next year, and so on. Your postal revenues will fall behind next year probably more than this year, because you can not very well say to one section of the country, "You shall not have rural delivery," if you do not say it to all sections.

Where can you raise the money? How can you legitimately increase your expenses and not attempt to find a way to increase the revenue? Of course you can sell bonds, and possibly for a time you can get along by using what is called the "reserve fund," established in 1900, which we now have, amounting to $150,000,000. Every time I take up one of the Government publications on the subject I see marked at the top "Reserve fund, gold coin and bullion, $150,000,000." I read them every day. I have never seen the day since 1900 that it has not been a hundred and fifty millions. Why? That is there for the purpose of maintaining the paper money of the country, maintaining the gold reserve. Has it ever been invaded? If any Senator will take the trouble to look, he will see that since that time the entire redemption could have been made for about $17,000,000 each year, which could have been taken and is taken from the current revenues of the country.

We have a provision in that wonderful bill of 1900 that whenever a thousand dollars is taken out of the $150,000,000 fund, immediately, the same day, a thousand dollars must go back; and if you should find a demand upon the Government of the United States for a hundred million dollars immediately and it were taken from this fund a hundred and fifty million dollars would be taken out of the Treasury and shoved into this fund. Will some one tell me—some wise financier, some man who knows all about maintaining the honor of the country and its credit—how much better it is, if any, to have it in this special fund than it would be to have it in the Treasury of the United States?

We might use that for a while, Mr. President, but in the end you must increase your revenues or you must decrease your expenses. You are going to build a canal. We have provided for selling a hundred and thirty million dollars of bonds for this purpose. We will sell them. There is no trouble to sell a 2 per cent United States bond in these days, if you give it all the rights that a national bond has, for use in banking and all of these things. But you will have to sell a hundred and thirty million dollars' worth more undoubtedly. I do not care whether it is a lock canal or a sea-level canal—it does not make any difference—you will not build it for that money.

If the Senator could show me that great benefit would come from this bill, I would not be very much alarmed about running in debt some, because with $140,000,000 in the Treasury, which is available now, and a hundred and fifty millions in the reserve, there is practically $300,000,000 we can use, and we might tide along for four or five years and not become bankrupt. But every year our expenses increase, and I think any scheme for the restoration of American shipping and American commerce, putting it where we were in 1860, when we were carrying the largest part of our products outward and bringing in the largest part of our imports, ought to be self-supporting, or there ought to be a proposition to secure funds to pay the expenses that will be incurred.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say on this subject. I do not regard this measure as threatening the stability of the Government or even its credit. I have not half the interest in opposing this proposition that I have in some others, and I do not think it will do any great injustice to any part of the country. I do not believe it will do much good to any part of the country. I do not believe it is based upon a system that will restore the commerce of the country in the way the Senator desires.

I wish to say that I made same objections to the Senator having the bill set down for a vote, but so far as I am concerned I am ready to vote on it now. I do not suppose the Senator wishes to have the Senate vote on it at this time, but so far as I am concerned I do not propose to enter an objection to anything the Senator asks for which the Senate is willing to agree to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have never at any time during the discussion of this measure felt like asking anything unreasonable in connection with it, nor do I feel that way now. I will venture to ask the Senate for unanimous consent that on Tuesday, the 13th of the present month, at 5 o'clock, we vote on the bill and all pending amendments and amendments that may be offered.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me suggest——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that he slightly amend the request for unanimous consent, and say that after the morning hour on the 13th, if any Senator desires to discuss any feature of the bill, that right shall exist.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the bill shall be taken up after the routine morning business on Monday and Tuesday of that week.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is satisfactory, so far as I am concerned, speaking only for myself.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that we shall vote on it at 5 o'clock on Tuesday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the pending bill and all amendments thereto now pending or hereafter to be offered be voted upon at 5 o'clock Tuesday, the 13th instant. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. And that the bill shall be taken up on Monday, the 12th, and Tuesday, the 13th, immediately after the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And that the bill shall be taken up Monday and Tuesday, immediately after the routine morning business. Is there objection?

Mr. DANIEL. Permit me to inquire if the Senator would object to making it Wednesday or Thursday of that week?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; not at all. I will make it Wednesday, the 14th. It will be quite agreeable; and that the bill shall be taken up on Tuesday and Wednesday after the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will restate the request.

The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the pending bill and all amendments thereto now pending or hereafter to be offered be voted upon at 5 o'clock on Wednesday, the 14th instant, and that the bill be taken up for consideration after the routine morning business on the Tuesday preceding, and on Wednesday the day of the vote. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to correct a mistake of which I was guilty when the bill was last up, and the statement I asserted with an assurance which I ought not to have used. It was in regard to the laws of other countries affecting the coastwise trade. I said that I believed that all other countries had laws confining the coastwise trade to their own vessels. The point was raised in regard to the coastwise trade of Great Britain—that is, the trade on the coasts of the British islands—and I stated that I thought it was reserved to British vessels. I was mistaken.

I ought to have remembered what I did well know—that the famous navigation laws, which were originally passed in the time of Cromwell's protectorate, were repealed in 1849, and the law which confined the coastwise trade to English vessels was repealed at that time or soon after.

What misled me was that I knew, as matter of fact, that the entire coastwise trade of the British Isles was carried in British vessels; and, of course, there are regulations, especially regulations of Lloyds Insurance Company, which make it very difficult for any foreign vessel to enter the British coastwise trade. There may be an occasional Norwegian ship engaged in that trade, but they are very, very few.

I found out, however, when I made my inquiries, that the coastwise trade of England's great colonies, like Canada and Australia, was confined to vessels of Canadian or Australian or British register—that is, of colonial or British register—and that foreign vessels are entirely excluded from that colonial coastwise trade unless the foreign country admits the vessels of the colony to its own coastwise trade. So, in practice, no foreign vessels are admitted to the coastwise trade of the British colonies, and the trade between the mother country and the colonies, owing to the exceptionally generous subsidies provided by England, is wholly in the hands of British shipowners.

France, Spain, Italy, and Russia, which command practically all the coasts of Europe where there is a considerable coastwise trade, have laws similar to our own, confining the coastwise trade to their own vessels.

I merely wished to make this statement, because, having made the error, I desired to correct it as publicly as I made it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator from New Hampshire will yield to me, I will move an executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; I yield.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 6, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 5, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 3, was read and approved.

CERTAIN TOWN SITES ON THE FLATHEAD INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8461) to amend chapter 1495, Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and diposal of all surplus lands after allotment," as amended by section 9 of chapter 1479, Revised Statutes of the United States, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 1495, Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment" as amended by section 9 of chapter 1479, Revised Statutes of the United States, be amended by adding the following sections:

"SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes, and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks, not less than 40 acres of said land at or near the present settlements of Arlee, Dayton, Ravalli, Dixon, and Ronan, and not less than 80 acres at the present settlement of St. Ignatius and Polson, and at such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlements.

"The work of surveying, laying out, and platting such town sites shall be done by competent surveyors, who shall prepare three copies of each of said town sites, which, when the surveys are approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be filed as follows: One in the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, one with the clerk and recorder of the county in the State of Montana in which such town site may be located, and one in the office of the Indian agent for the Flathead Indian Reservation.

"Whenever any portion of any tracts of land so set aside for town-site purposes shall, at the time of its survey, be occupied by any member of any tribe of Indians living upon said reservation, or any Indian trader, or other person or corporation, or any church organization, or school district, lawfully occupying the same, such occupant shall be allowed to purchase any lot or lots upon which he then has improvements, other than fences, tillage, and temporary improvements, at $10 per lot, not exceeding ten lots to any one person, corporation, church organization, or school district. All remaining lots shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior from time to time at public auction to the highest cash bidder under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe: Provided, however, That no lot shall be sold for less than $10: And provided further, That said lots when surveyed shall approximate 50 by 150 feet in size.

"SEC. 18. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside 160 acres of land at and surrounding the present hot springs, situated on said reservation near the settlement of Camas.

"That said hot springs and the said 160 acres of land last mentioned shall be under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, but any and all moneys that shall be derived from such use shall be for the benefit of the persons holding tribal relations with said tribes of Indians, the same to be disbursed as provided in section 13 of this act.

"SEC. 19. That nothing in this act shall be construed to deprive any of said Indians or said persons or corporations to whom the use of land is granted by this act of the use of any water appropriated or used by them for the irrigation of their lands or for domestic use or any ditches, dams, flumes, reservoirs constructed or used by them in the appropriation or use of said water."

With the following amendment:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman two or three questions about this bill. It is so long that I could not understand it very well. What is it all about? I reserve the right to object.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that two years ago Congress passed an act opening the reservation to settlement. At that time in the preparation of the bill we forgot to put in a provision regarding the town sites. There are six or eight little nucleus settlements throughout the reservation where there are little towns now, probably twenty or thirty or forty houses, and this provides for the platting of these 40 acres into town sites and the sale of the lots at public auction to the highest bidder, the money to go to the Indians. That is the first provision.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This is the Indians' land?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They get the benefit of it?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And reported in the last Congress with the exception of one section?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. It was passed in the last Congress.

Mr. LACEY. It would increase the price of the land for the Indians, each town site giving that much higher to the Indians than if it had been sold under the general law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether or not it entails any expense on the part of the Government?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. None at all. It occurs to me as the bill is read there was an appropriation for the original surveys, reimbursable to the Government out of the proceeds of the sale of the land.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. These Indians want this thing done as well as the white people?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Every one on the reservation. Every head chief has been talked with.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are always anxious to sell the land and get the money and spend it, I suppose?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. They are getting $10 a lot under this bill, whereas under the original bill they would get only $5 an acre.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DIXON of Montana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WATERWORKS FOR LAWTON, OKLA.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13674) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, etc., approved March 3, 1901,' approved June 30, 1902," which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act to amend an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, etc., approved March 3, 1901," approved June 30, 1902, be amended by adding thereto the following:

"And provided further, That in the event the amount which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to cause to be expended for the town of Lawton is found by him to be not sufficient for the purpose intended, including the securing of an adequate water supply for said town of Lawton, he is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to cause to be expended out of the proceeds of the sale of town lots in said town, under the conditions, limitations, and restrictions above set forth, and subject to his supervision and control, the further sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be available from said proceeds, so that the total amount which he is authorized to cause to be expended as aforesaid for the town of Lawton from the proceeds of the sale of town lots in said town will not exceed $210,000."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What committee reports this bill?

Mr. LLOYD. The Committee on Territories.

Mr. LACEY. It provides for the disposition of town lots in the town of Lawton, does it not?

Mr. LLOYD. No; it provides for the disposition of part of the proceeds of the sale of town lots. When Comanche County was laid out and Lawton established as the county seat, the law provided that the lots should be sold and that the money should be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, to be by him used in county improvements.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; I remember that bill came from the Indian Committee originally.

Mr. LLOYD. And under that they have constructed a county court-house, a county jail, and built bridges and made quite a number of improvements.

Mr. LACEY. There is nothing involved in this bill excepting the further disposition of the funds that are now in the hands of the town of Lawton?

Mr. LLOYD. That is all.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill itself is as formidable as its title?

Mr. LACEY. No, sir; it is not so dangerous.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the bill should pass. I understand the situation there, and I think it is urgently demanded, and the bill should pass.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

On motion of Mr. HEPBURN, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to regulate railroad rates, Mr. VREELAND in the chair.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, at the last Congress I voted for a bill that was aimed to meet some of the difficulties that are now sought to be reached by the pending measure. More ample consideration and further examination of the question, and as I trust a more full appreciation of the gravity of the situation, has led me to the conclusion that as the bill now stands it is impossible for me to support it, and I beg the indulgence of the committee for a while that I may give some reasons that lead me to that conclusion. I am perfectly well aware that conditions exist throughout the country giving rise to agitation that this legislation is expected to adequately meet. I have not any doubt, Mr. Chairman, that grievances exist, that injustices have been done, that there is oppression, and that there are grave discriminations and great difficulties involved in the transportation problem. I doubt very much, however, whether the picture is entitled to the dark shades that have been given to it by some of the distinguished gentlemen who, in the enthusiasm of the moment, have engaged in this discussion.

It would not be very surprising, Mr. Chairman, with some two hundred and ten thousand miles of railroad transportation, with the investment of something like eleven billions of capital, involving every financial and business interest in the Republic, in its articulation, interdependence with these business interests, that we should necessarily have difficulties, injustices, oppressions, and grievances. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that this great body of which we are members in time past has been guilty of foolish and extravagant conduct, and I have no doubt that in time to come it will to a certain extent repeat those curious performances. The Supreme Court itself has had occasion from time to time to reverse itself, upon a more full consideration of important questions depending before it, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has made more blunders than it has exercised right and proper judgment in connection with this very question in the discussion of which we are now engaged; so that, Mr. Chairman, it is not surprising these conditions exist. I concede also, Mr. Chairman, that they exist in such a degree as may require reasonable legislation for the purpose of adequately and conservatively meeting the situation, and to a reasonable extent I am perfectly willing to go, and, as I shall indicate a little later, I am perfectly willing to follow in the lead of any distinguished gentleman who may have mapped out a line of legislation that will reasonably and conservatively and fairly and judiciously undertake to meet adequately this situation.

There are a few things, perhaps, to which I should call attention and allude to in passing. First, there is this: A good deal is said, if I may judge—I have been necessarily deprived of attending the exercises of the House for the last two or three days—but a great deal has been said in this discussion as to the paternity or proprietorship of this legislation. Now, Mr. Chairman, I take a very languid interest in the question as to who may be the originator of legislation that may be desirable. If William Jennings Bryan is the proprietor or originator of the proposition that impresses me as wise and just, I shall vote for it, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding he is the proprietor. [Applause.] It is entirely immaterial to me who may be associated with or responsible for a legislative proposition. If it commends itself to my judgment, I will vote for it, no matter who may support it. On the other hand, if it fails to commend itself to my judgment as being right I will vote against it, no matter who may indorse and approve or originate it. The responsibility of legislation is ours and we act, Mr. Chairman, upon it. It is a great pleasure, though, for me to say in the very outset of this discussion under these conditions that I would support—although, as I shall indicate a little later, it might not be absolutely necessary for the purpose of adequately taking care of existing conditions—I would support a measure that went as far and no further than the recommendations of the President of the United States in 1904 and 1905.

I said I cared very little about the paternity of the measure. I would not like to have that applied, however, to the name of the distinguished gentleman who stands to-day as the sponsor of this measure before the House. If this legislation proves to be wise—as I very much fear, aye, as I believe it will not if enacted into law—if it should prove to be wise, it is a great pleasure to me to know that the distinguished chairman of this committee has given his name to this bill. His services—long, arduous, patriotic, efficient, and successful—to his constituents and to his country, his great ability, and his high character and unquestioned integrity rightly entitle him to any mark of legislative distinction that is within the power of this body to bestow. [Applause.]

Now, I wish to advert to a few fundamental suggestions before I reach the discussion of the concrete proposition pending before this body. I hear people discuss this measure, and I read the discussions, and they refer glibly to a reasonable rate and the circumstances under which this legislative body may exercise a legislative control over that rate. What is the origin of the legislative power to control the exercise of a public franchise?

The origin rests, Mr. Chairman, so far as this general control is concerned, upon the broad fundamental principles of the common law, because never yet was a public franchise granted, either for the operation of a railroad or a water company, an electric-light company, or for any other public purpose, that did not involve inherently the fundamental proposition that it should be exercised in the public interest, that the public should be served at a reasonable rate without any discrimination. That is fundamental. It has been the law of the land from the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. We do not act here under the legislative power to regulate and control a franchise by virtue of this inherent power, because we are not acting upon Federal corporations. Very few railroad corporations get their life and being from Federal legislation. The vast mass of them are the creatures of the State; and it would be for the State to exercise this power as a scientific, legal proposition. But we undertake to exercise a power, and we can exercise it by virtue of the commerce clause of the Constitution, which enables us to say, not how they shall exercise a franchise and protect the people in the exercise of their rights and serve them in a just and reasonable manner without discrimination, but upon what conditions corporations engaged in interstate commerce shall do their business. And under that I concede, Mr. Chairman, that we have undoubted power to enact this legislation.

I grant the suggestion of my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] upon that line. I think our power is full and plenary. But let me go a little bit further with some general suggestions which absolutely underlie this whole agitation. What is a reasonable rate? Who is there upon this floor that can tell? I undertake to assert, Mr. Chairman, and I challenge successful contradiction, that there is not to be found in the books, either in the reports of the States or the reports of the United States Supreme Court, one single case that lays down a definite, scientific rule upon which a reasonable rate can be determined. It is absolutely indefinite and indeterminate to the very last degree. Not only is that true of the decisions of the courts of the country—and well might Mr. Justice Harlan, in the opinion in Smythe v. Ames, say that this was surrounded by a great deal of embarrassment—I say, not only is it true as to the judicial tribunals of this country, but it is more than true of the Interstate Commerce Commission. They do not know, no other person knows, what that definite, scientific rule is. You may search the opinions of the Interstate Commerce Commission from the year 1887 to the year of our Lord 1905, and no live man can tell by any decision that tribunal has ever rendered what its next decision will be upon the question of the scientific determining of what a reasonable rate is. No railroad, no shipper, can tell from the decisions already rendered what the next decision is to be. I do not suggest, Mr. Chairman, that these important and underlying considerations should negative any legislative action.

But I suggest them on the threshold of this discussion in order that we may appreciate the vast and tremendous difficulties involved in this great question, in order that we may fully understand what power we are proposing now by this bill to vest in a purely political tribunal without recourse and without appeal. If any distinguished gentleman desires to examine the law for the purpose of ascertaining the character of this indefiniteness and would like to get the most recent and valuable declaration of a court upon this great question as to whether there is any definite, scientific basis upon which a reasonable rate is to be determined, which is the absolute foundation of all this agitation, the complete genesis upon which this bill must ultimately rest, I will give him two cases to which he can refer. There is a distinguished and able judge in my State, Judge Savage, a very learned man, who has rendered two opinions which contain more careful, scientific detail, marking it out more plainly than any other opinion yet announced by any court; and yet after all he says they have this same delightful uncertainty and this characteristic great indefiniteness. I will give you the names of the cases, and if you have any occasion or curiosity you can refer to them. Kennebec Water District against Waterville, 97 Me., 185; Brunswick and Topsham Water District against Maine Water Company, 99 Me., 71.

Now, these suggestions, Mr. Chairman, are simply fundamental, and they illustrate the infinite difficulties involved in the question to be submitted to this tribunal, which is to be vested with power by this bill. It provides for determinations that are practically absolutely arbitrary to the very last degree. That is the kind of power we propose to rest in this tribunal.

I have said, Mr. Chairman—and I wish to emphasize that assertion—that I would be entirely willing upon this occasion to follow the recommendations of the President of the United States; and so I would. But I submit that this bill goes vastly further. I do not wish to be understood, however, as admitting that it is absolutely necessary to pass many of the provisions of this bill, except a few minor details, because I submit, and I submit it with all candor, under these circumstances of excitement, that if the provisions of existing law, statutory, Federal in their character, and the provisions of the common law, which require every carrier to serve at a reasonable rate and without any discrimination, independent of either Federal or State legislation, fundamental as the law itself, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if the existing provisions of Federal legislation, which are nothing more than the enactment of the fundamental provisions of the common law, and their application to interstate commerce, if they were reasonably and fairly and continuously enforced, and the people who are affected by this condition would avail themselves of their common-law rights in the tribunals established by law for the purpose of maintaining and vindicating them, nine-tenths of the occasion for this legislation would absolutely vanish and disappear.

But, Mr. Chairman, I said that I would support this bill, provided it followed the recommendations of the President of the United States. Now, I wish to make myself clear. There are three great important particulars in which this legislation is not in harmony with the recommendation of the President of the United States. Under these circumstances it has become a very important political question, and we stand here to-day upon this floor and witness the edifying spectacle of both sides of this Chamber engaging in a legislative race to see which side will get most credit for applying relief to this condition; and in that race, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the procession has gone away beyond its leader; the army is away in advance of its general. The leader has made some prescriptions calculated to take care of this disease, but under our zeal, under the circumstances, I submit, Mr. Chairman, with great confidence and I trust with great candor, that in our zeal we have gone vastly further and are about to apply remedies not recommended or asked for, which, in my judgment, will be vastly worse than the disease.

First, this bill confers upon this Commission, in my opinion, the power to initiate rates; second, the bill does not give what the President's recommendation, twice repeated, declares is necessary in order that it may conserve wise legislation. It does not give any court of appeal. And the third is vastly more important than either. This bill puts in the hands of a tribunal of seven men the power to say whether they shall have eliminated the preferential rates that prevail everywhere in all this great Republic, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico, and which absolutely affect every class of business interest in this country, and upon which their business welfare and prosperity depend.

INITIATING RATES.

Now, I say first, Mr. Chairman, it confers the power of initiating rates. It is hardly necessary for me to call attention to the fact, as I shall now do, that the President says in so many words that he does not want that power conferred. He says:

> I call your attention to the fact that my proposition is not to give the Commission power to initiate or originate rates generally, but to regulate the rate already fixed and originated by the road upon complaint and after investigation.

The committee agreed entirely with that, and made this assertion in their report:

> As before observed, the power to initiate rates is not given to the Commission. So far as is known, but very few persons have thought it wise to confer this power, and it is just to the Interstate Commerce Commission to say that, as we are advised, no member of the Commission thinks it wise that they should be invested with this power.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I concur with the President, and I agree with the distinguished chairman of this committee. I do not believe that a tribunal of seven men should be at one and the same time a detective agency, a prosecuting attorney, and a lord high executioner, even though railroads may be the subject aimed at. I agree with the President of the United States, and with the distinguished chairman of the committee. Now, as to this assertion of the chairman as to the effect of this bill, I feel bound to say, taking into account his great ability and integrity, when I came to read the bill I had grave doubts of the fact, but on more careful reading of it, and I submit it to the consideration of my distinguished friend, it satisfied me, Mr. Chairman, that while it may not have been intended or expected, that this amendment contained in this bill does, under the circumstances, confer precisely that power. I call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to section 4 in this bill, which amends section 15, and I beg you to note carefully its language:

> That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made—as provided in section 13 of this act.

This section 4 neither adds to nor takes from the powers vested in this Interstate Commerce Commission by section 13. It does not increase their power; it does not diminish their power. It leaves it exactly where section 13 defines them. And then we have this concluding language in section 4, amending section 15:

> The foregoing enumeration of powers shall not exclude any power which the Commission would otherwise have in the making of an order under the provisions of this act.

Expressly providing that the provisions of law that obtain in section 13 shall remain absolutely intact. Now, let me call your attention to section 13, and the manner in which, under that section, complaint may be originated.

> SEC. 13. That any person, firm, corporation, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act in contravention of the provisions thereof, may apply to said Commission by petition, which shall briefly state the facts, etc.

What does section 4 amending section 15 do? It simply reenacts all the provisions of section 13; but I have not read them all. Under section 13 the Commission have held that a common carrier could not make complaint. Complaints were confined to parties interested adversely to the common carrier. The amendment gives to common carriers that right. This does not make any other change in that section, but that section contains another provision which further defines how complaints can be made. The concluding parts of section 13 read as follows:

> Said Commission * * * may institute any inquiry on its own motion in the same manner and to the same effect as though complaint had been made.

That is "the complaint" made as provided in section 13 of this act.

As the law now stands, adverse complaint and complaints or inquiries instituted by the Commission amounting to the same thing, are the only things upon which the Commission can base an investigation or a finding. Their finding or order is not effective until approved and enforced by the court. The amendment simply adds the carrier as a complainant and makes the orders made on complaints self-executing. As to adverse complaints, the only change made is in the consequences following the complaint. The adverse complaint is, under the bill, potential as the basis of a self-executing order. That portion of section 13 conferring upon the Commission the power to "institute any inquiry" remains in full vigor, as no attempt is made to in any way amend it. The Commission still has the power to "initiate any inquiry," and as the bill makes the adverse complaint potential as the basis of a self-executing order, and as the inquiry instituted by the Commission still has, by the express language of the statute, "the same effect as though complaint had been made," the conclusion is obvious and necessary that the Commission "may institute any inquiry" that will also be the potential basis of a self-executing order. Hence to all intents and purposes they can initiate rates.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly; except I would not like to have the gentleman take up too much of my time, as I have a great deal of ground to cover.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just a moment. I am very much interested in the point the gentleman is making, and have the opposite view of it. Section 15 says, "Whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made, as provided in section 13."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Precisely so.

Mr. HARDWICK. That language would not cover any action originated by the Commission itself, would it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It covers every complaint contemplated by section 13. Section 13 provides for two methods of originating proceedings, in terms for the originating of complaints, one by the adverse party, and expressly confers upon the Commission the power to originate an inquiry, in effect a complaint itself, in the same manner and with the same effect as though a complaint were made.

Mr. HARDWICK. It does not say that the Commission may originate complaints itself.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; it does not, in terms; but complaints are provided for and the Commission is authorized to make a complaint substantially itself. The Commission originates the inquiry, in the same manner and with the same effect as though complaints were made, and I will say further that a distinguished member of that Commission, after conference with myself, now entertains the view that this probably does confer upon the Commission this power. I agree with the President, the committee, and the Commission that this power of originating complaints ought not to be conferred upon them, and this bill clearly carries that power with it. They ought not to be allowed to roam about the country looking for trouble. If people are injured they will find it out, and if they are not enough interested in having their wrongs righted to make a complaint to the Commission they ought not be wet-nursed into litigation by a statutory prosecutor.

REVIEW BY THE COURTS.

This bill does not undertake to give any review by the courts; and I desire to read the recommendation of the President of the United States upon that point, and then I desire to discuss this question for a few moments as to how effective a review may be and under what circumstances it may be had. The President of the United States repeats twice the proposition that there must be a review by the courts. I will read his first recommendation:

> In my judgment, the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it is found to be unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts.

It does not answer that recommendation to say that under certain circumstances the court can review the action of this Commission, circumstances which practically amount to confiscation, under which the extraordinary power of the court of equity can be invoked. I submit the President of the United States in making this recommendation contemplated that the legislation that conferred upon this Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix a maximum rate and maintain that rate until it was overturned by a review by the courts would contain a provision providing for that review. He repeats this recommendation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the President of the United States contemplated that the courts should determine in review what was a reasonable rate—should review the reasonableness of the rate?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is exactly what the President said.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the gentleman contend that the power could be conferred upon a court to do anything of that kind?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I will reach that point a little bit later, and I think I will explain my position perfectly well to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. The President says:

> But, in my judgment, the necessity for giving this further power is by no means as great as the necessity for giving the Commission or administrative body the other powers I have enumerated above; and it may well be inadvisable to attempt to vest this particular power in the Commission or other administrative body until it already possesses and is exercising what I regard as by far the most important of all the powers I recommend as being vitally important—that to fix a given maximum rate, which rate, after the lapse of a reasonable time, goes into full effect, subject to review by the courts.

Now, if language in a Presidential message is entitled to ordinary construction, I submit that that conveys to the ordinary mind the meaning that the President of the United States contemplated, whether constitutionally or otherwise—I have not reached the discussion of that point as yet—that the same legislation that invested this tribunal with this extraordinary autocratic power would also vest another tribunal with a power to review the determination of that tribunal. Whether it is constitutional or not raises another question. I would say, in connection with this question, that under these peculiar circumstances and curious conglomerate of legal relation, that this Commission undoubtedly, when it undertakes to determine whether or not an existing rate is fair or reasonable, acts in a judicial capacity, and it is also absolutely true, Mr. Chairman, that when it undertakes to say what a rate shall be it acts in its legislative capacity; so that we have, independent of the question of review, a curious conglomerate of legal powers in this incongruous, administrative, judicial body; a union of judicial power, executive and legislative power supposedly to be exercised, aye, must be exercised, according to the genesis of this bill at one and the same time by the same tribunal.

I will say as to that proposition that I am not clear whether it is possible, whether it is constitutional, whether it is proper for us to combine judicial, legislative, executive, and administrative functions in one and the same body at the same time, political in its character though it may be. There has not yet been any determination by the courts of the United States or any other courts that hold that that either can or can not be done. The courts have talked about it. Judge Sage, in an oral opinion in one of the Federal reporters, said that this tribunal exercised a quasi judicial power as well as a legislative power; but that is the foundation of your whole proposition—that you can combine in one body three—yes, three—absolutely distinct, independent, constitutional powers—judicial, administrative, and legislative.

That is the foundation of your proposition. Now, if it be sound that that can be done, I want to say that at least on one of the phases of the power vested in this tribunal—that this curious act vests in it—the court would have the right to review at least that judicial power. Whether they could go further and vest in it the right to control the legislative power, of course, as my friend says, that raises a serious question, and I doubt whether it can be done. Under the theory as maintained and thoroughly believed in by some, that when in this bill this Interstate Commerce Commission is vested with the power to say whether a rate is reasonable or otherwise and vested with the power to fix a just and reasonable rate, it is acting, Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the provisions of the law, and if it should turn out that it did not fix a just and reasonable rate that it then violated the law and hence it was open to review by some higher tribunal on the ground that its acts were unlawful. It is claimed the court would have that power. I do not say I adhere to that so far as I am concerned, but if you can take your conglomerate Commission and make it stand up under the provisions of this bill, it may be possible that you could make a provision that would stand, that would take that same Commission before a court that would review its determinations in accordance with the law of the land.

Why, it is no answer to the suggestion to say we are engaged in legislation here that involves a proposition that no railroad can be protected against a decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission unless—what? Why, unless its decisions practically deprive it of its constitutional rights, take its property without due compensation, deprive it of its property by depriving it of the value of its use; that under these extraordinary circumstances a court of equity is called upon to intervene. Now, for a moment let us divorce ourselves from the excitement appertaining to this great question. Does not every lawyer upon this floor know that a court of equity never interferes under circumstances like that except—when? Except when the constitutional right of a railroad is invaded or infringed. Is this a bill for the purpose of exercising the right of eminent domain and under that guise take away the value of the property of the railroad companies? If you are going to exercise the control you are talking about and the circumstances under which you propose to exercise it, one might suppose that you propose to invoke at least one element of eminent domain, that of taking the property. We are creating a tribunal which will simply say what is a reasonable rate.

Does the Constitution of the United States, I ask you, Mr. Chairman, guarantee to any railroad company 6 per cent on its capital, 5 per cent, 4 per cent, 3 per cent, 2 per cent, or 1 per cent? Not for a moment; and the only point where we are able to interfere is precisely the point that is just within the point of confiscation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I understand the gentleman's argument correctly, he holds that it is possible that a court might review the orders of the Commission on the ground that it would be lawful to make such a review. I ask him if he does not understand that this bill provides that this action may bring in question the lawfulness of the Commission's order, and if the court has power to do that, inasmuch as this bill does not interfere with any of the existing powers of the court, that that right would still rest with the petitioner?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will answer the gentleman by this suggestion: Every lawyer knows—and that includes my friend, because he is a good lawyer—that no man can go into a court of equity and ask for the interposition of a writ of injunction except in an extraordinary case. It is absolutely fundamental to the equity jurisdiction.

It is only when the constitutional right under this bill would be infringed and invaded that the power of the court can be invoked, and there is not a lawyer when he sits down and coolly reflects but knows that is a perfectly accurate statement of the law of the land. This right can not be impaired by the Congress or by any tribunal created by it. Now, forsooth, is that an appeal from the orders of the Commission that are to take effect and be operative until this extraordinary power is invoked? Now, I do not say that the legislative discretion of this Commission can be reviewed by the court. I do not think it can, although I will admit the authorities are not entirely uniform on the proposition as to when the court will interfere.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not talking about——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. One moment. I desire to say this: I say any orders of this conglomerate tribunal known as the "Interstate Commerce Commission," composed of judicial, executive, and legislative authority, so far as it exercises judicial authority, it is subject to review; so far as it exercises purely executive, administrative, or legislative authority, I do not think it is open to review.

I do not think it is open to review until the exercise of that legislative discretion infringes the constitutional right of either the railroad or some other person in this country, and in this instance it is only railroads, because it is only aimed at them.

While I am on this point of the discussion I want to call attention to the fact that there is no well-considered case that says just exactly under what circumstances the court will interfere by injunction. Asking the time of the House, I am going to call attention now, just for a moment, to the decision of the Supreme Court upon that question found in Smythe v. Ames, 169 United States, 466. I will read a few of the citations upon which the court relied, and call your attention to the facts upon which the court passed in that particular case. The court makes several citations, three or four of which I shall read extracts from. One extract is from the case of Budd v. New York (143 U. S., 517), where the court said—this was involving the precise proposition as to when the United States Supreme Court would interfere by injunction to restrain the operation of an order of a State commission, not the Interstate Commerce Commission, but a State commission, involving the same legal principle—and in that case the court said that—

> Such power [commission] was not one to destroy or a power to compel the doing of the services without reward, or to take private property for public use without just compensation or without due process of law.

And from the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., 362) the court made this citation:

> This, as has been often observed, is a Government of law, and not a Government of men; and it must never be forgotten that under such a Government, with its constitutional limitations and guaranties, the forms of law and the machinery of government, with all their reach of power, must in their actual workings stop on the hither side of the unnecessary and uncompensated taking or destruction of any private property legally acquired and legally held.

And again, from the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway case (156 U. S., 649):

> There is a remedy in the courts for relief against legislation establishing a tariff of rates which are so unreasonable as to practically destroy the value of property of companies engaged in the carrying business, and that especially may the courts of the United States treat such a question as a judicial one, and hold such acts of legislation to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, as depriving the companies of their property without due process of law, and as depriving them of the equal protection of the laws.

The next case is the Covington case, and from that the court cited:

> A statute which, by its necessary operation, compels a turnpike company, when charging only such tolls as are just to the public, to submit to such further reduction of rates as will prevent it from keeping its road in proper repair, and from earning any dividends whatever for stockholders, is as obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States as would be a similar statute relating to the business of a railroad corporation having authority, under its charter, to collect and receive tolls for passengers and freight.

Now, I beg you to note that in these three or four citations made by Justice Harlan in his opinion every one of them proceeds upon the hypothesis that it is confiscation that fixes the boundary of the jurisdiction of this Commission, and it is only when the point of confiscation is reached that the extraordinary power of the court in equity and appeal, forsooth, to review the decision obtains. Nobody on earth, Mr. Chairman, can question the jurisdiction of this legislative body in the operation of its legislative functions, and we clothe this Interstate Commerce Commission with our legislative power, with all its privileges and subject to all these conditions, and among others, that supreme power to exercise within its scope its uncontrolled discretion.

Now, what does Justice Harlan say after having cited these various opinions, every one of which turned upon confiscation? He said:

> In view of the adjudications these principles must be regarded as settled.

After stating two principles unrelated to this discussion, he states the third, as follows:

> While rates for the transportation of persons and property within the limits of a State are primarily for its determination, the question whether they are so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the Constitution secures, and therefore without due process of law, can not be so conclusively determined by the legislature of the State or by regulations adopted under its authority, that the matter may not become the subject of judicial inquiry.

Now, that was the Smyth & Ames case. Seven railroads were being considered and the order of the railroad commission of the State of Nebraska cut down their rates 29½ per cent. It turned out upon examination that in one case at least under this order of the railroad commission the earnings of one railroad had been so reduced that it would have been operated at a loss of $62,243, and it was absolute confiscation in that case.

There were seven roads affected, and in all but two they would have been operated at a loss, and in those with only a very small margin above operating expenses. So the court said:

> On the contrary, we are of opinion that as to most of the companies in question there would have been, under such rates as were established by the act of 1893, an actual loss in each of the years ending June 30, 1891, 1892, and 1893; and that in the exceptional cases above stated, when two of the companies would have earned something above operating expenses in particular years, the receipt of gains, above operating expenses, would have been too small to affect the general conclusion that the act, if enforced, would have deprived each of the railroad companies involved in these suits of the just compensation secured to them by the Constitution.

So that I think, Mr. Chairman, that the summation of the legal proposition is fairly this: That the Court will simply stop just this side of confiscation. This bill confers no rights of review of any kind upon the courts. So far as the railroads are concerned it stops short of nothing except their constitutional rights, which it has no power to invade.

PREFERENTIAL RATES.

Now I wish to go further and say, in my judgment, this bill confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission power over the preferential; and here again I regret very much to say that I am not able to agree with my distinguished friend the chairman of this committee. I want to call attention right here to this important fact. Is there any agitation to-day in this country, is there any demand in this country that this Interstate Commission should be authorized to put its hands upon the preferential in existence throughout the length and breadth of this land, without which business could not exist and interference with which would greatly impair business? What is the agitation and what is its strength?

Is there much said against the increase of rates or against excessive rates? Very little. The complaints are principally about rebates and discriminations, but little about excessive rates. And under those circumstances or conditions has anything been said concerning the preferential rate? The report says:

> As but little complaint has been made to the committee concerning classification, it was not deemed wise at this time to suggest new legislation upon that subject. So, too, with the question of the relation of rates. The committee has not deemed it wise at this time to suggest new legislation to change existing law upon that subject. It is one of very great importance—interesting, however, as a rule—to certain particular communities rather than to the public at large. It involves conflicts between towns and cities rather than the public generally, and it relates more to the building up of certain local interests of a local nature rather than to the interests of the people of the whole country.
> Therefore we thought best not to hamper or hinder the subjects of the bill by adding to them those other less urgent considerations. In fact, the committee has endeavored to confine its action to the recommendations of the President as contained in his annual messages of 1904 and 1905.

Here we have the great authority of this committee establishing the fact that there is "but little complaint," and that the recommendation of the President does not include "the relation of rates." This ought to settle that question.

Now, right here upon this point let me call attention to one of the latest fulminations of an archagitator on questions involving railroad legislation and railroad rates. I refer to an aarticle by Ray Stannard Baker in the February number of McClure's, in which he makes one of his very intense and interesting attacks upon the beef trust and speaks of the rebates and advantage of indiscriminations by which they are enabled to build up their business.

He says, referring to Armour:

> He was getting special favors, rebates, concessions, discriminations, by which unfair, unjust, and positively unlawful means he built up his business. That was wholly bad.

Not a word about preferentials or differentials or even excessive rates per se, but rebates, discriminations, private cars, refrigerator cars, switches treated as independent lines, fake lawsuits, etc. And that is the burden, Mr. Chairman, of the song.

Now, I submit that this bill confers upon this Commission the power to control the preferential, and of course I understand perfectly that in this I am undertaking to demonstrate a proposition that will be gratifying to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and I feel sorry that I am obliged to differ with the distinguished chairman of the committee.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is not only open to that construction, but is bound to have that construction. Under existing conditions, what has the Commission done? When the Commission has found what they call an unjust or undue preference, and that a locality is injured by this preference, or an individual industry, they have issued an order, ordering them to desist, and these orders have to be complied with in one of two ways. What is the essence of a preferential? The essence is that less is charged pro rata for a long haul of transportation than for a short haul. How would you correct this preferential? Either by raising the rate of the long haul or by lowering the rate of the short haul. Either, Mr. Chairman, is equally as potential, as successful; and in compliance with such orders of the Commission heretofore made, both ways have been used interchangeably and with like success. That is to say, they have either raised the rate of the long haul or lowered the short-haul rate. Now, I submit that this bill——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the gentleman state that the Commission have ever raised a rate?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not know whether they have raised a rate or not. No; the Commission has never raised a rate and it has never lowered a rate. The Commission, whenever they have made any order in connection with the preferential, if Mr. Prouty stated it correctly to me—the Commission has simply issued an order for the railroad to desist when they are engaged in what they believe to be an undue or an unjust preference between localities, and they have left it to the railroads to determine whether they would raise the long-haul rate or lower the short-haul rate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to say to the gentleman in that connection that if he will read the report that the Commission made to the Senate during its hearings, or read Senate Document No. 30 in the Fifty-fourth Congress, he will discover that they did lower a rate. I call the gentleman's attention specifically to the case known as the "Walla Walla Case." The Commission ordered that they should desist from charging the then existing rate, and that they should not exceed a certain lower rate.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is precisely the proposition here. This bill in terms gives the Commission the power to lower a rate absolutely. I am obliged to the gentleman. The order which he says the Commission made is precisely the order they are authorized by this bill to make.

Now, what is the bill? Let me read it on that point. Section 15, page 10, as amended, says, after providing that the Commission shall investigate the question of unduly preferential or prejudicial rates:

or otherwise in violation of the provisions of this act—

Mark you—

otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act.

It does not stop at one section, it does not stop at two sections—"or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act."

Any act that they have no right to do, any act that they ought to do, can be inquired of by the Commission under the express language of this bill. Now, how does section 3 read? It is not amended by this section, but it is a part of this act. Section 3 reads:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Now, I am not discussing the propriety of this; I am discussing the question whether they have the power to take charge of the preferentials. I have here the report that was made to the Senate by the Commission, and if I have time before I get through with this discussion I will take occasion to refer to it, because it demonstrates the inefficiency of this Commission as compared with the traffic managers in the control of the railroad system in fixing rates, if the determination of the Supreme Court of the United States stands for anything.

Now, this section 3 of the act in terms gives the Commission the power to inquire into the preferential between localities, and section 15 says they may inquire into any violation of the provisions of the act.

And then what? My friend says that they have imposed a lower rate. That is just exactly what this bill authorizes them to do when they find a preference existing, which simply means a low rate with a long haul as compared with a high rate with a short haul. What does this bill say? The bill says they may fix "the charge or charges to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged." They are authorized by section 3 to consider the preferential proposition. They are vested with a power by the amendment to consider the violation of any provision of this act, and this act itself authorizes them to say what the maximum rate is that shall be charged, and they can say to the short haul with its high rate, Cut down the rate and wipe out the preferential. Now, there is another provision of this bill which practically in terms confers this vital, important power upon this Commission, and against which I may say now that my argument is made and in which I find the most vital objection to this legislation, because I think it is extremely dangerous in its character.

What is the next provision? I am reading now from line 25, page 10, "and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from any violation." Mark you, that, so far as it goes, is exactly a repetition of the law as it now stands. How does the law read on that point as it stands now? It reads as follows in section 15: If they find that anything has been done or omitted to be done in violation of the provisions of this act—it shall be the duty of the Commission to forthwith cause a copy of its report in respect thereto to be delivered to such common carrier, together with notice to such common carrier to cease and desist from such violation.

That is all we have in the law to-day—an order to cease and desist. Now, then, suppose we have a preferential, and the Commission are of the opinion that it is undue and unjust to the extent of being 10 per cent too low, or, if you please, upon the short haul 10 per cent too high? What does this amendment do? This amendment authorizes them to make an order that the common carrier shall cease and desist from such violation.

Now, on the assumption that I have made—and it is a perfectly proper assumption, because it might well occur—they have found a violation of the act to the extent of 10 per cent too low on the long haul or 10 per cent too high on the short haul, a violation of "the provisions of this act." Then, what does the bill say? Instead of stopping there, as the old law did, it goes on to provide "and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the Commission shall find the same to exist"—expressly conferring upon this Commission, if they find a discrimination either upon the long or the short haul, the power to order the common carrier to desist to that specific extent. I say I am not discussing the propriety of the proposition—whether they will exercise their judgment wisely or otherwise—but I am discussing the question as to whether the power is vested in this Commission, and I submit it will be impossible under a fair analysis of the conditions of this bill, taken in connection with the provisions of the existing law, to hold otherwise.

They have the power to take into account the preferential and say whether or not the long haul—that is, the low rate—shall be higher or the short haul—that is, the high rate—shall be lower. It would be, if in their judgment it was unjust or unreasonable, a violation of the provisions of this act, and in terms they are authorized to say to what extent that desisting shall take place, or, to quote the language exactly, "the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist." So that, I think, Mr. Chairman, I have demonstrated that this bill confers upon this Commission what I believe to be a tremendous power. Now, what is the power? It is the power to regulate and control the preferential that exists not only between industries and individuals, but between localities, and you want to bear in mind this fact, if this is an important power and if this is a grave question, we ought to be careful how we act here, because any power vested in this Commission is probably vested in it for all time.

We are not legislating for to-morrow morning; we are not legislating for the year 1909. We are legislating here, not only for the railroads, but for the business interests of this country and for our children and our children's children, and the question is whether we will take the vast interests of this country, independent of the railroads, because, as I say, I submit to you that the interest the railroads have in this question is, in my judgment, a minor one in its character as compared with the vast interests involved in this bill, so far as the business interests are concerned—the question is whether we shall take from their managers the control of the railroads and their development of the conditions that exist to-day, with flourishing localities, and the permeation of these preferential rates throughout the length and breadth of this country, that flexible, moveable, adjustable, articulate control that is now vested in them and place it in a cast-iron strait-jacket, of which this Commission shall be the sole possessor of the key with which to lock or unlock the industries of this country.

What is a preferential? Simply this: How would California get its fruit into the East and be able with its peaches to compete with the peaches of Georgia and Delaware if it were not for what, Mr. Chairman? Why, a long haul at a low rate. Where would the oranges of California be in competition with the oranges of Florida if they were not able to carry them across a continent from the Pacific to the Atlantic through the operation of a long haul at a low rate? And yet this bill puts it in the power of this Interstate Commerce Commission to keep in California by change of that preferential every particle of fruit grown in that State. A blunder on their part would rot it in the orchards.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? I wish to say, inasmuch as the time of the gentleman from Maine has nearly expired and there are so few of us who entertain the opinion so ably expressed by the gentleman from Maine, I hope the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will afford us an opportunity to voice our opinion by extending to the gentleman time sufficient to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will yield thirty minutes additional time.

Mr. SIBLEY. I hope the gentleman——

Mr. HEPBURN. There are other gentlemen who expect to speak who are here awaiting their time.

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, we understand that, but I trust he may be permitted to conclude. This debate had better go over one day more. We have got everything except the appropriation bills behind us and let us have one more day's debate, so the truth may be ascertained, rather than we shall not have the opportunity of hearing the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I hope I will not be interrupted much more.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a single question. From 1887 to 1897 the Commission fixed rates, upheld some differentials, and possibly regulated or reduced others. During these ten years the country was not paralyzed nor were widows bankrupted. Why can not we have a Commission like that?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will advert to the action of the Commission, if I have time, before I get through my speech.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why can not we confer this power on a commission? It is not more power than the Commission exercised for ten years.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The Commission has never yet succeeded in enforcing in the Supreme Court of the United States practically a single decision they ever made upon the question of differentials.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. None have ever gone there.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Ah, well; that is another proposition. Whether any minor cases involving merely cases of advice have been followed or not I can not undertake to say. I have their report, I have it here in my hand, and, if I am not interrupted and have sufficient time, I will allude to it before I get through; but I defy any man to take that report and undertake to tell us whether they have undertaken in any advice they have given to disturb any preferential or differential that has existed in this country from time immemorial until now, and under which the vast industrial development is growing now from one end of this country to the other.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield to me just a moment? I would ask the gentleman if his attention has been called to the fact that the carriers themselves in trying to fix differentials have themselves voluntarily gone to the Commission and submitted the question to them and allowed the Commission to fix the differentials for them? I ask the gentleman if he knows that to be the fact?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I understand an arrangement of that sort may have been made some time, but that does not involve this question. I call attention to the preferentials between localities. In 1902 I stood on the wharf in Tacoma, and I saw taken out of an old fishing smack halibut which were loaded in a freight car, and I learned that very car was attached to a passenger train and was carried to the Atlantic coast; and three weeks later, on returning, I learned from a fish dealer in my town that he had sold halibut that had come that distance by means of a preferential. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the farmers of Nebraska within the last year have been sending their cream to a creamery in Omaha. That creamery has manufactured it into butter and sent it to Lowell, Mass., in competition with the farmers around St. Albans, who send their cream to the creamery in St. Albans. So, through a pronounced preferential the farmers of Nebraska are competing at that point with the farmers of Vermont. This the Commission can arbitrarily stop. Out in the State of Iowa there is furnished an illustration of what in operation this legislation could accomplish. They have now existing a plan formulated by the railroad commission of the State of Iowa which concentrates in the hands of the jobber in Iowa the jobbing trade.

Now, how, and why? Why, simply in this way: The jobber can ship from Chicago in carload lots right through Colfax to Des Moines, 20 or 30 miles beyond Colfax, and the jobber in Des Moines can break the cargo lots, and can ship the same freight in smaller lots back to Colfax at substantially the same price or less than the direct rate from Chicago to Colfax. There is a preferential existing throughout the State of Iowa, and it will be open upon this bill for the shippers in Chicago to insist that there is a preferential existing in favor of the jobbers in Iowa; and that there is no reason why the rate from Chicago to Colfax should not be in proportion to the rate from Chicago to Colfax via Des Moines back to Colfax. This Commission, under this bill, can disorganize the whole railroad system of Iowa.

Look at the wheat that is raised in the great Northwest. How much of the wheat that is raised in the Northwest could find a market on either ocean, find either point of departure, find either the hungry people of Europe or Asia, the Occident or the Orient, if it was not for a low preferential rate that exists in its favor?

Take into account, if you please, the cotton industry. We have cotton mills in the South, we have cotton mills in the North. Now, I happen to know, under existing conditions, with the favorable hours of labor and the lack of embarrassing labor legislation prevailing in the South, and the facilities they have for the employment of child labor, that to-day it is all the people in New England can do, with their cotton mills, to compete with the cotton mills in the South. A preferential exists in favor of the cotton mills in New England. They transport their raw material at a cheaper rate on a long haul than the mills in the South can from the same point of the supply of the raw material. They ship their manufactured products out in precisely the same way, on a long haul, at a cheap rate.

Do I want to turn over to the tender mercies of a political commission of seven the existence of the cotton industries of New England? Within two weeks I have had it stated to me by distinguished gentlemen who believe in this legislation and are anxious to see it prevail, that they hope under its terms to destroy the preferential charges existing in favor of these New England industries in order that the industries located near the raw material can have the benefit of what they call their natural proximity thereto. They conceded that by this indirect method they expect to transfer the cotton manufacturing industry from the North to the South. I do not propose by my vote to put in the hands of seven men the question as to whether there shall still be a Fall River, a Lawrence, a Lowell, a Manchester, a Biddeford, or a Lewiston. Their interests are too vast. There are too many millions involved. The employment of too many people is dependent upon it.

I will not take the chances with any political tribunal without revision or appeal and put into their hands these vast business interests. Worcester, the heart of the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, represented upon this floor by a worthy and able son of a most distinguished sire, and presenting to-day the finest illustration of diversified manufacturing industry that can be found in the confines of this great Republic or in any other land, is absolutely dependent upon its preferential long haul for the shipping in of its raw material and the shipping out of its manufactured products. I will not consent to put the fate of Worcester into the hands of any commission to say what its future shall be, whether it shall live or die, whether it shall flourish or whether it shall vanish as a manufacturing industrial center; whether its manufactories, now busy and active, profitably employed, shall be silent, filled only with rusting machinery, and its houses, now occupied by an industrious people, shall in the future be filled with poverty, want, and distress.

I have in my own State—I do not know that it is affected by the preferential—the finest illustration of the dependence of development upon railroad transportation that I think can be found anywhere. Fifteen years ago, at Rumford Falls, there were but two farmhouses, and yet at that spot, with its splendid, wondrous beauty, there was a waterfall with 30,000 potential horsepower roaring, rushing, and tumbling unharnessed to the sea. It had no transportation. Material had to be carried in and hauled out by teams. About fifteen years ago men of genius, with capital behind them, put a railroad into Rumford Falls, and that place is utilizing to-day 17,000 horsepower. It has 10,000 people, and is the finest illustration of manufacturing and industrial development that can be found anywhere. I do not propose to leave that community where any seven men can arbitrarily and without appeal control its destiny and say whether it shall live or die.

Let me call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to this fact, that the power to fix a maximum rate, segregated from other rates, if you can segregate them, independent of its relation to other rates, without correlation to other rates, is very trifling, especially if it is confined to complaints in individual cases, as compared with this vast power you are conferring upon this Commission.

In case of an excessive rate, if it is so charged, and if the Commission determines that the rate is excessive and cuts it down, who is affected?

The railroad, and the railroad company alone. It simply affects the stockholders and bondholders by diminishing the receipts of the company. And if they get to where it reaches beyond the danger point, they have a remedy. It would aid industries and communities by cheapening and facilitating transportation. But here is a vast community and vast interests that are absolutely dependent upon railroad transportation for their life; and whoever has the power to put their hands on the railroad transportation has the power to throttle the business interests served thereby and wipe out localities, especially if they can control the preferential. Gentlemen know that industries are now carried on by vast aggregations of capital, with the large volume of business that is done on a very small margin, so that any increased burden on that business might well bankrupt those engaged therein. What would be the effect upon a community or industry if the long-haul rates were raised? It would make it impossible for them to successfully carry on the business in which they are now engaged, and if the short-haul rate was lowered the result would be the same.

If the long-haul rate were raised, the railroads would gain, at least temporarily, and there could be no complaint from them, because while the dissolution was taking place in the industry or locality affected, the railroad would be getting its harvest. It would be increasing its gains, and it could not complain of the rate that had been made. Where is the appeal, however, for the locality that is adversely affected, if you please, by an inadvertent or mistaken order of this Commission? Do you find it anywhere? It is not so nominated in the bond. There is no appeal for the industries of this country. They stand before this Commission at their mercy and in their power. They can regulate us and they can control us. Do gentlemen have any notion of the interest involved in this legislation? I say, in the whole equation, that the interest of the railroads is negligible in extent. What have the railroads involved? There are said to be about $11,244,852,000 of capital invested in railroads, according to the census.

Of course, my friend from Michigan says it will be about six or seven billions. Other people say it will be about fourteen billions. They receive $2,188,108,801 annual earnings and income. How about the interests and the products of industries the existence of which are solely dependent upon cheap transportation? How about the value of mines and mining, of manufactures and of agriculture? There are in agriculture, mines, and manufactures invested $32,860,630,402 capital—manufactures, $9,846,628,564; mines and mining, $2,500,000,000 (estimated), and agriculture, $20,514,001,838. The value of their annual products was $18,575,304,735—manufactures, $13,039,279,503; mines and mining, $796,826,417, and agriculture, $4,739,118,752. In addition to this are the billions invested in mercantile pursuits, likewise dependent upon transportation for existence. If the long-haul preferential was wiped out and there was an increase made, so as to cut off in transportation their ability for competition, these business interests might be destroyed.

What would agriculture be worth if this Commission was to exercise an unwise and vicious power? I call attention again to that vicious power and the evil of its exercise over any industry, either of mines or mining, agriculture, manufacture, or mercantile, as being without right of appeal from the autocratic fiat of this Commission when it is once issued. Only the railroad can interfere. Manufacturers, farmers, miners, and merchants do not exercise any public franchise. The Constitution does not guarantee them a reasonable return for the amount of money invested in mines and mining, in agriculture, or in manufacturing industries or mercantile ventures. They have to fight for their lives in the open market, and this Commission is to sit on the valve that controls the circulation without which they can not live. I submit to the candid consideration of this committee, Mr. Chairman, that all of these interests are vastly more vital and more potent than the mere interest of the transportation companies themselves. Our industries furnish the vital lifeblood. The railroads simply the veins and arteries through which it circulates. The railroads have an opportunity to go into the court and protect their rights and preserve their existence under the power of injunction, but these industries have not.

Now, let me go a little further and call your attention to the fact that the answer may be made that this power is only to be exercised in cases where an injustice has been done. Now, the question is whether it is wiser and safer to put these vast business interests, involving billions of dollars of invested capital and $18,000,000,000 and more of annual products, in the hands of seven men politically appointed, dependent for their tenure of office upon favor of the powers that be or that are to be, or to leave them in the hands, if you please, of the ten or twelve that have up to date managed them in this tremendous and successful development.

What has been the result—what has been accomplished under the control of seven or eight men as railroad managers—and I assume it for the purpose of argument, although I know, and every other man knows, that no seven or eight men control the immense diversity of rates for transportation in this country, but, on the contrary, thousands of men are engaged every day of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year, less Sundays, in adjusting and modifying and regulating and accommodating these rates to the condition or conditions of business to meet the demands of the markets throughout the country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, although I have but a short time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that these seven men, or six or ten men, that he is talking about—president, general superintendent of the great railroad lines—have nothing whatever to do with fixing the rate and know nothing about the system?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have no doubt the gentleman is entirely right.

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). But that they are fixed by the traffic managers?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Precisely so. Hundreds and thousands of traffic managers, experts, grown up in the business for years and familiar with the development of the business and with the great industrial interests of the country and of the people whose servants they are.

Now, then, is it wise to take it out of the hands of these hundreds and thousands of men who have demonstrated their ability and capacity by the condition of the industrial, agricultural, mining, and mercantile prosperity and success of this great country to-day, the parallel of which has not been seen since history began to be written? It is for gentlemen who want to transfer the control and power for fixing rates, especially the differential rate, to put the control of this vast property and this medium of transportation, these instruments of communication between one part of this country and the other, serving its vast business interests over long distances and necessary rates—it is for the gentlemen who want to transfer it from the thousands of experts to satisfy us that the seven men, politically appointed, will give us better administration and accomplish better results.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; if you will not take up too much of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In connection with the gentleman's statement that the rates are fixed by the traffic managers, I want to ask him if he recollects the incident mentioned in one of the Interstate Commerce Commission's reports, where a rate was raised in the Southwest, complaint was made, and the traffic manager went on the stand and swore that he did not himself raise the rate, but that he raised it in pursuance of a dispatch or letter sent to him by an official in New York State; that he had nothing to do with it himself? The Commission decided that it was unjust and that it ought to be lowered.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin have an idea that with thirteen billions of money and 213,000 miles of railroad you will not have sporadic cases of unjust rates? That is absolutely incident to every human condition. We can not expect perfection from railroad managers; and I want to say to you that if you put it on the basis of perfection, the ability to determine what is right and what is wrong under the laws of the land—thank God! not agitation, not excitement, not passion or prejudice, but under the laws of the land—I say if you put it on the question of efficiency, I will demonstrate from their own record the utter incapacity of this Interstate Commerce Commission to take charge of this great question. I state that advisedly.

Let me go further and see how they can justify turning over this great transportation that so articulates itself with the business interests of this great country and upon which everything is dependent from the hands of these experts into the hands of seven men. To justify it they must satisfy us that they will improve conditions. Will there be more farms? Will they be better cultivated? Will there be more industries? Will they build up larger towns than have already been built up by traffic conditions that have been operated under practical economic conditions and natural laws in a zone where it is practically impossible for legislation to effectively enter? If they will not do that, what will they do? Will they paralyze development, or go further? I submit that it is for them, notwithstanding some disagreeable and unjustifiable conditions, to satisfy us and satisfy the industries of this country that they are going to safely exercise this power and at least maintain, if not improve, conditions. Who is there that can take the responsibility of making that assertion and guaranteeing that result? How can we get a "bond of fate?"

Now, I call attention to what my friend from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has once or twice alluded to, and I hold in my hand a document called "Regulation of Railway Rates, Appendix D," and it is the response of this Interstate Commerce Commission to a resolution of the Senate committee. What does it say? I am not going to undertake to revise every decision made by this Interstate Commerce Commission. I am going to do this: I am going to try the efficiency of this Interstate Commerce Commission. I want to go further and say here that I have no reflection to make on any gentleman who is a member of that Commission. I know the most of them. They are men of high character, great ability, of public spirit; they are honest, patriotic citizens endeavoring to do what they think is right, and if it be true that they have blundered more often than they have been right, it is not because of any lack of intention; it is not because of any inferior ability; but it is because of the infinite and inherent difficulty involved in the whole situation, in the attempt to control by legislation what should be left to the operation of individual control and the operation of natural laws and causes. It is not their fault; it is the fault of the scheme of control.

Let me call attention to what they say, and after I have called attention to this Commission I desire to call the attention of this committee to the possibilities inherent in this situation, the kind of Commission that we might finally land with, because, as I have already said, we are not legislating for tomorrow, we are legislating for years to come. I do not believe that Theodore Roosevelt would ever appoint men on that Commission who were not good men, and if certain men are appointed whom it is now suggested may be appointed I would very gladly join in saying that in my judgment it would be a very wise selection; but Theodore Roosevelt is not always to be President of the United States. We may not always control the policy of this Governmnet. There may be other men to control it, and I shall refer to that a little later. What has the Commission done up to date? I try them not upon all the acts they have performed, but by every act they have performed upon which the court has passed, and I have here the record. I am going to take the cases that have gone to the courts of the United States for the purpose of determining whether this conglomerate Commission, consisting of judicial, executive, and legislative power, has been able up to date by reason of the uncertainty and indefiniteness of the situation to reach wise and just and lawful conclusions. Here is the record: Excessive rates, Commission sustained, three cases; Commission not sustained, twelve cases. Now, then, if that is any criterion, they are four times as likely to be wrong as they are to be right.

Mr. TOWNSEND rose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, I am coming to what the gentleman undoubtedly has in mind in a moment. I shall call attention to that. Wait until I am through and then I will yield. I am going to give these people a fair deal; yes, a square deal—something that is often talked about. [Applause.] Unjust discrimination, Commission sustained eight times; unjust discrimination, Commission not sustained twenty-four times. That is their record. In other words, in case of unjust discrimination, prima facie, the record shows when they have been tested by the law of the land as administered by a tribunal that holds its tenure for life, subject to good behavior, and can not be removed except by impeachment—this tribunal that can be removed any moment by Executive power—the record shows, when tested by that standard, that they are three times as likely to be wrong as they are to be right in the case of unjust discriminations. Now, I ought to say this, there are three of these cases involving the maximum rate where the Commission adopted a rule that had not been passed upon at that time by the court, and they adopted the wrong rule, so that it does not indicate that the Commission were in that sense wrong. It ought to be deducted from the amount.

There were seven cases involving the preferential where they had announced a decree before the court construed the rule, and therefore the Commission, of course, was wrong in that, so that there are ten cases that should be deducted. But I am going to give the defense the Commission itself makes on this question, for I want to treat the Commission fairly. The Chairman of the Commission says:

> Four cases have been discontinued and 4 are now pending in circuit courts. In 6 of the 29 cases in which the orders were not enforced the decision was based wholly or partly—perhaps it would be fair to say mainly—upon the ground that the new trial in the courts, which occurs under the present law, developed such a different state of facts from those found by the Commission, because of new and additional evidence not produced before the Commission, as to modify or change in material respects the findings upon which the ruling of the Commission was predicated. In the other 23 cases the decisions of the courts, also rendered after new trial, were based upon a different construction of the act than had been made and attempted to be applied by the Commission. In these cases, in other words, the courts held directly or by implication that the statute did not give the Commission authority to make the orders sought to be enforced.
> The courts have not held in these cases that the grievance found and condemned by the Commission did not exist in fact as ascertained and reported; they have merely held that the things done which constituted the grievance could not be prevented under the present law. It was not decided in any case that the acts complained of were not wrongful and unjust, but that the correction attempted by the Commission was not within the scope of its authority.

Mark especially this language:

It was not decided in any case that the acts complained of were not wrongful and unjust.

Now, in Appendix A we have the cases given by the Commission. The first case I call attention to, bearing in mind the fact that the assertion of the chairman is—inadvertent, no doubt—that the facts show that where they undertake to interfere with the rate it did not appear that the railroad was right, but it appeared, on the contrary, that the Commission was right and the railroad wrong. Let me take the second case which they cite, and the second case is a case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company (145 U. S., 263). That was a case involving the question as to whether or not it was unjust for a railroad company to sell party tickets in lots of ten for less than they sold one ticket. What did the Commission do? Well, the Commission held that the party-rate ticket constituted an unjust discrimination and was therefore illegal.

Now, to sustain the assertion of the chairman of this Commission, it should appear that the court also held that that was unjust, but overruled for other reasons. The Commission, as it appears by the opinion, held that the "party-rate" tickets constituted "unjust discrimination and are therefore illegal." Let me quote from the language of the opinion:

> The court held that they were not open to the objection found by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In other words, they were just and they had the right to sell them, but upon the question of justice or injustice the Interstate Commerce Commission was not sustained by the court and the railroad was.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have you any data showing how many cases of Federal judges were reversed by the Supreme Court wherein it reversed or affirmed the action of the Commission? Do you not find the Supreme Court reverses the courts as well as the Commission?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly. I find they reverse the courts; but we are not vesting autocratic, despotic power in a court. I am simply discussing the tribunal in which you propose to vest this power. It is beside the proposition when I am undertaking to determine whether or not the railroad managers have been right or the Commission have been wrong to spend my time discussing a question as to whether a Federal judge is right or wrong. Now, I will not take further time, because my time is drawing to a close, to go over these cases in detail, and will briefly summarize them.

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Lehigh Valley Railroad Company (74 Fed. Rep., 784) the Commission determined the cost of carrying a ton of coal at 85 cents. The chairman says: "The court held that this method of estimating the cost of carrying coal was not justified, because it assumed that the expense of transporting coal over this particular branch of the carrier's system was necessarily only the average cost of carrying coal over the entire system." But the court, in its opinion—not quoted by the chairman—went further, and said: "We have only to add that the evidence before us is quite convincing that the actual cost of transporting coal from the Lehigh and Mahanoy regions to Perth Amboy was and is considerably more than 85 cents per ton;" hardly a holding that the carrier's charge was unjust.

In Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company et al. v. Interstate Commerce Commission (162 U. S., 184), the Commission held that the Atlanta rate was unreasonable and reduced it from $1.07 per 100 pounds to $1, on the ground that it was unreasonable, and the abstract shows that "That court held that the Atlanta rate was not unreasonable." The road was right, the Commission was wrong. In Interstate Commerce Commission v. New York, Philadelphia and Norfolk Railroad Company the Commission held charges on articles from Jersey City to Philadelphia unreasonable and ordered a reduction.

In the circuit court, after hearing more evidence, the petition was dismissed and again the carriers' rate was sustained as just. In East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad Company v. The Interstate Commerce Commission (181, U. S. 1) the Commission found that it could not sustain one of its decisions unless a certain rate was shown to be unreasonable, and upon a full hearing it was compelled to dismiss the petition, as it could not be shown that the carriers' rate was wrongful or unjust, and for the fifth time the road as against the Commission was sustained.

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Chicago, Burlington and Quincy R. R. Co. (186 U. S., 320) the Commission held "a terminal of $2 was unreasonable," and say in their abstract: "The Supreme Court said that the order of the Commission condemning the $2 rate was general and operated upon all the carriers in the whole territory covered by the complaint, and it plainly appears from the decision of the Supreme Court that on account of such reduction having been made from undefined territory it was unable to determine from the record whether the order of the Commission as applied to the whole territory was and should be enforced." It is proper to say, as illustrating a method of ratiocination, that from the case it "plainly appears" that the court used this language:

> It can not be in reason said that the inherent reasonableness of the terminal rate, separately considered, is irrelevant, because its reasonableness is to be determined by considering the through rate and the terminal charge contained in it, and yet when the reasonableness of the rate is demonstrated by considering the through rate as reduced, it be then held that the through rate should not be considered.

Well, that looks pretty elementary, and then the court said:

> In other words, two absolutely conflicting propositions can not at the same time be adopted.

By the court, mind you, not by the Commission, because the Commission did adopt it and proceeded on that basis. It says further:

> It follows that there can be no possible view of the case by which the conclusion that the rates were unjust and unreasonable can be sustained.

By all of which it does not seem to appear that the carrier was wrong and the Commission right on the facts. Seventhly and lastly, in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company (190 U. S., 273), the Commission also found as an independent proposition that the rates from New Orleans to Lagrange were unreasonable and unjust under the first section of the act, and on that point the court said: "No room in reason is left to sustain the view that the Commission could have held that the rates to Lagrange were in and of themselves unreasonable, irrespective of the competitive condition prevailing at Atlanta and the arrangement of rates which arose from it, which formed the main subject of complaint."

I leave this statement of the chairman, with this abstract of the cases that he cites to sustain it, without any comment. It is clear that more than two-thirds of the time, on the question of the justice or the injustice of the rate, where it has been tested by the courts, the Commission has been wrong and the carriers have been right, and upon that showing they coolly ask me to turn over these vast business interests to this Commission, subject to its plenary autocratic power. I do not reflect upon the Commission. It simply demonstrates the inherent difficulty of placing a commission in a position where it has to deal with a question so vast and complicated.

Other people may think differently about it, but for one, Mr. Chairman, I will not accept an invitation to place such vast business interests of this country in the hands of a commission that is thus indeterminate, because of its demonstrated inability to determine those things wisely and well or as well as the carriers themselves have determined those questions.

Now, I said this is a political Commission. That is true. What do I mean by that? I mean exactly what I say. I mean that that Commission is bound to be affected by the political conditions that prevail from time to time in this country. What is it? Why, this Commission, as it exists to-day, consists of five men. The act creating it reads as follows:

> SEC. 11. That a Commission is hereby created and established to be known as the "Interstate Commerce Commission," which shall be composed of five Commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Commissioners first appointed under this act shall continue in office for the term of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from the 1st day of January, A. D. 1887, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired time of the Commissioner whom he shall succeed. Any Commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Not more than three of the Commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party. No person in the employ of or holding any official relation to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or owning stock or bonds thereof, or who is in any manner pecuniarily interested therein, shall enter upon the duties of or hold such office. Said Commissioners shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. No vacancy in the Commission shall impair the right of the remaining Commissioners to exercise all the powers of the Commission.

The act provides that they can be removed for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. What does this act do? Of course everybody understands that the President of the United States to-day can arbitrarily remove any man on that Commission by simply stating that he is inefficient, that he has neglected his duty, and that he has been guilty of malfeasance in office. There is no review of the action of the President. He is supreme. But the specification of these causes of removal is some restriction upon the arbitrary exercise of that power by the Executive, but in the last analysis the Executive can remove them, and no one can say him nay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended five minutes in order to enable him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. This bill, Mr. Chairman, provides in an additional section—not an amendment to section 11, which provides for the circumstances under which removals shall be made—but this act provides for a new section, and the new section does not say anything about the circumstances under which a removal shall be made:

> SEC. 8. That a new section be added to said act at the end thereof, to be numbered as section 24, as follows:
> "SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of seven members with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the Commissioners and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the Commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1911, one for a term expiring December 31, 1912. The terms of the present Commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present Commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional Commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the Commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than four Commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party."

I do not undertake to say as an absolute hard and fast legal proposition that the same restrictions do not apply, but I very much doubt it. If the section creating the Commission and providing that they could not be removed, except for inefficiency and neglect of duty and for malfeasance in office, had been amended by making the Commission seven instead of five, there would not be any question about it. But under these circumstances you have a new section practically providing for a new Commission. And that Commission, if that restriction does not apply, can be removed without cause at any time by the President of the United States. In any event the President has the supreme power of removal and no tribunal can review his action.

Let me submit this proposition. I have said that Theodore Roosevelt may not always be President of the United States. According to his repeated declarations, he will be President for the balance of this term and no longer. And after that some other gentleman will be President of the United States. What is possible? I can imagine some man as President of the United States in whose hands I would not want to see vested the power to control this Commission of seven men, four to be members of one political party. How long would it take a President with a complacent Senate to remove enough to make four of his political party? And what if that political party happened to be the Populist party? I want to say here and now in all seriousness, when many distinguished gentlemen who, not perhaps in connection with this question, sometimes lend their aid to the dissemination and the propagation of the ideas that tend to segregate a few individuals in the community into what is known as the "classes" and array against them the masses, nobody can tell who will be the President of the United States or what influence will be behind him. If you inflame the masses and preach and inveigh against what you call the "classes"—against invested capital—I warn you now that you may kindle a fire that you can not stamp out when you get ready to extinguish it. [Loud applause.]

Let me go a little bit further and ask, What if we have a Populist President? I have in my mind the name of a gentleman that I would not want to leave the constitution of this tribunal in the hands of. It would be perfectly open to him to have four that represented his peculiar views and his extraordinary vagaries in connection with the government of this great country. More than that, it would be open to him to arbitrarily remove the other three; and what power is there on earth, under the terms of this bill or any other, that would require him under those circumstances to appoint three others, and make that Commission full? Why, the law now assumes that it is not necessary to fill vacancies, and expressly provides, "No vacancy in the Commission shall impair the right of the remaining Commissioners to exercise all the powers of the Commission."

It makes only four a quorum, and it is open to any vicious man who occupies the White House and has his creatures in this Commission to take, by removing three, the industries of this great country by the throat and compel them to bow down and worship him. Three is a majority of a quorum, and your act is so constituted and the possibilities are such that it is open to have three men, viciously inclined, take the mining, manufacturing, and agricultural and mercantile interests of this country, and, through the medium of that vital transportation upon which they exist and without which they can not live, throttle them until they waver and die or render the necessary tribute to Cæsar to enable Cæsar to control the political destinies of the Republic.

Now, other men may agree to it, but so far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I decline to assent to that proposition. I know that public agitation and excitement, inspired, maybe, by passion and prejudice, violence and hate, may carry men off their feet. To-day we have agitation and excitement and prejudice arrayed against the great transportation interests of this country. Our friends of the West, inspired by their exasperation and out of just resentment cry out, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" and the more extreme this legislation the greater the gratification.

I warn you that if we weakly quail before this storm and turn over these vast interests bound hand and foot to this fallible political tribunal without recourse or appeal, that when the disastrous results that are well-nigh sure to follow the exercise of this tremendous uncontrollable power shall be visited upon a helpless people that same people will turn again and rend you because you have been false to your trust as representatives of the American people. Inspired by passion, prejudice, smarting under the sting of resentment, because there are wrongs that have not been redressed, they may now bless us, but then, with equal facility and vastly greater zeal, they will rise up and curse you. They now applaud. Then we shall be anathema maranatha. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, this committee is to be congratulated upon the high order of excellence of the debate upon this most important proposition of legislation upon railway rates. We have been especially instructed and entertained by the remarks of the three distinguished gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], and, lastly, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], who have addressed us in opposition to the passage of the pending measure. If the dire prophecies of these gentlemen could become true, if the doleful results which they foresee could come to pass, none of us would want this measure enacted into law. It is because we are confident that there is not contained in this bill any of the provisions upon which these gentlemen base their arguments and prophecies, it is because we believe that they have brought into this Chamber only huge phantoms of their own imagination and have conducted a most vigorous moot combat against them that we have been comfortably edified here to-day. We believe in their mind's eye they have seen huge and evil things—horrid and unearthly shapes—which are not possible within the provisions and results of this legislation.

I agree with some of the propositions so powerfully advanced by the gentleman from Maine, as to the joinder of the great powers of government—executive, legislative, and judicial—in the authority given this Commission; also with some of his remarks with regard to its history and record. But with his basic propositions—with his construction of the provisions of this bill as to their power to initiate rates, the power to review their rate-making orders, their power to control differentials—your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce are unanimously opposed to his views and believe them to be entirely unwarranted and unfounded by any fair construction of the bill before this House. I shall briefly discuss these subjects in the course of my remarks. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] relied much upon the able treatise of Professor Meyer upon railroad rates. If they had been as conversant with this bill as they seemed to be with that book neither of the speeches would have been delivered—at least, not in the form they were. This bill is a compromise. No one contends it is perfect; no one is entirely satisfied with all of it; but we all agree that if it could be enacted into law it would be of far greater good than evil. Your committee fully realize the seriousness and the great importance of this question. They framed this measure not as one of class legislation, but to prevent class distinctions. We believe it will tend to allay class hatred and class prejudices; that it will be for the great interest of all of the people—of the railroads as well as of the consumers and producers of this country.

REASONS FOR LEGISLATION.

Your committee realized that there exists a profound unrest throughout the land; that men are stirred because of the too prevalent arrogance and heedlessness of concentrated wealth, because of the notorious abuses of corporate power and privileges, and especially of public franchises, granted by a generous people. They are stirred, too, because of recent revelations concerning men of power and influence in the financial world, who disclosed their inability to realize the sacredness of a trust, and of their carelessness with the property of others confided to them. The people realize that many of the prominent lines of industry in the country have been concentrated into a few hands, and that some of the most important are in the grasp of monopolies controlling the sources of a nation's necessities. Then, too, the great railroad business of this country has gradually been concentrated into a few great systems, necessarily by the pressure of business conditions. These great industrial concerns, and these great transportation systems, and the great financial interests of this country have gradually become interwoven one with the other into a most complicated and powerful arrangement. It is only natural that such intimacy and the tempting opportunities for vast power and wealth should blunt the senses of men.

EVILS OF REBATES.

In the business of transportation there have been the abuses of extortion and favoritism. It was because of these abuses nearly twenty years ago that there was compelled the enactment of the original interstate-commerce act. Many of these abuses have continued, others exist to-day. The system of rebates originally started by the railways has since grown into a tremendous weapon for the powerful and unscrupulous shipper to eliminate his weaker and more conscientious competitor and to establish a more or less complete monopoly in the particular line of business. It is this system of favoritism which has contributed so much to upbuild the already powerful and conscienceless and to oppress the weak, the defenseless, and the innocent. It is this system of favoritism which has created the monopoly of so many of our sources of supply and distribution and has prevented the development of resources in parts of our land. This system of favoritism and combination has injured the enterprising and industrious and the progressive of our people. It has decreased opportunities and discouraged the very class which in a Republic like ours needs and deserves encouragement. It has tended to breed class hatred and a burning sense of injustice. So that many of our thoughtful and conservative have lamented existing evils and prophesied dire results in the future unless these vicious tendencies can be checked and controlled.

RAILROADS FACTORS OF DEVELOPMENT.

Our committee realizes, on the other hand, that the railroad interests have been the chief factors in the wonderful development of our country. That in the enormous progress in every line of material endeavor the railroad managers have done more than their full share, so that at the present time the prosperity of our country is mingled inextricably with that of the great transportation interests of the land. It is by the boldness and genius of our railway managers that our vast wildernesses have been traversed, our mountains have been pierced, and the uttermost parts of a common country inspired by a common patriotic sympathy.

By the construction of great railway systems the old frontiers have been eliminated and the markets of the world brought to the bold pioneers of our fertile prairies.

This development has become so interlinked with the universal interests that the prosperity of the railways and people are mutual. Any injury to one is certain to react upon the other. Both must prosper or fall together. We have by far the largest internal commerce of any nation in the world, amounting to more than $22,000,000,000 annually, of which more than $13,000,000,000 is of manufactures, $6,400,000,000 of agriculture, $1,600,000,000 of mineral products, and $700,000,000 of forest, fisheries, and miscellaneous.

And a very large part of this most splendid production and development depends for its chief value upon the facility and cheapness to reach profitable markets. This is provided by the railway systems of the country. So that a very large part of our population has become dependent upon the progressive excellence of our railroads, which have developed into the most efficient in the world, with the least expense on the average to the patrons.

MORE IMPROVEMENTS NEEDED.

Then, too, there never has been a time in our history when there was needed more development in the various lines of transportation than right now. New lines of railway are required and projected into the waste places of our land, and additional lines of communication are planned; many single tracks should be doubled and double tracks should be quadrupled; heavier rails and roadbeds are required for the tremendous loads, and much additional equipment should be furnished to our producers. During this last fall millions upon millions of bushels of grain have rotted upon the ground because of lack of facilities for carriage. Millions and millions of dollars have been wasted in other lines for lack of facilities. Yet we know the shops are running overtime to keep pace with the orders to supply these pressing needs. We think all this should be done, even while existing evils must be considered; and your committee has deemed it of the utmost importance that some measure should be framed which should not imperil one dollar of present invested capital; that should not prevent one dollar of additional capital entering into these improvements; that should not diminish the facilities or the safety of the person or the property of our people, and should not reduce the amount or the wages of our skillful and faithful labor in the railroad service. We believe this measure accomplishes these difficult results, and that it will remedy some of the evils; that it will not bring the dire calamities so vehemently prophesied by the opponents of this bill.

PROVISIONS OF BILL.

Now, this measure, in brief, contains five affirmative provisions:

First. The power to fix a maximum rate and make it effective.

Second. The power to prescribe through routes and rates and make divisions thereof.

Third. Extending the affirmative power and scope of the Commission over such subjects as private cars and refrigeration, terminals and private switches, elevator charges, and, in short, over the various devices now used to grant or secure rebates, drawbacks, personal discriminations, favoritism, or unfair advantage.

Fourth. The power to enforce proper schedules and determine the length of time for putting them into effect, with the expectation that thereby the evil of midnight rates may be eliminated, or at least diminished.

Fifth. The power to make and require examinations and reports as to the affairs of public carriers.

The pivotal point in this bill, the one upon which there is the greatest or, in fact, only contest, the proposition which naturally arouses the strongest and most bitter antagonism, is that of the power to fix the rate. The other provisions are of benefit and yet are of secondary importance, and most of them are agreeable to nearly all interested in transportation. The great contest is over the power to control a maximum rate for freight transportation.

OBJECTIONS OF RAILROADS.

Now, we all realize that this power is strenuously opposed by the great transportation interests of this country, and there is a natural reason for such opposition. First of all, they can not seem to consider this question of transportation in any other way than as one of their own personal business, which they have as much right to operate as they see proper, within limits, as the owner of a grocery store, sawmill, or stone quarry. They all believe that they can transact every part of their vast and important business better than the public can do it, or any part of it, for them. They have the natural pride in successfully conducting and extending the great enterprises associated with their name and fame, and which they know will prosper under their own management. They have a right to that pride and belief, and they have a right to exercise that vast power so long as it does not conflict with the greater public interest. But this question presented to us to-day is beyond the personal pride, ambition, or ability of these men, beyond the question of successful personal control of their great business. It concerns one of the basic functions of our Government—one of those great questions of public concern which will affect the business interests of this nation and our people for all future time, and it ought to be settled without any sentiment of passion or prejudice and with the sole desire to do whatever shall be necessary and best for our great country and its future. The main and sole question is, Shall the great function and power to finally and adequately control the railroad interests in their relation to the people rest with the railroad corporations and their private management, or with a public tribunal having authority to effect justice to all interests?

FUNDAMENTAL PROPOSITIONS.

Some propositions seem fundamental. First, that railways are public carriers; that commerce is of public concern, and that common carriers are engaged in a public business and are subject to public regulation and control; that corporations in doing this work are transacting the public business by permission of the public and must be subject, naturally, to public regulation; and wherever the private corporate interests conflict with the great public interests the public must necessarily be paramount and the private must be secondary. These propositions have been well established by the Supreme Court of the United States and by the courts of last resort and by the legislatures of nearly every State in the Union. It is realized, too, that these great railroad interests have now become combined into eight or ten great systems of immense wealth and power, and that the persons engaged in managing the railroads are, in too many cases, also engaged in other lines of business having connection with the railroads. This makes an overpowering temptation to use the great power of the railroads to help personal friendly interests to the detriment of the general public. It is realized, too, that these vast interests, as a rule, have their headquarters in the city of New York. These great systems control from 150,000 to 200,000 miles of railway, radiating all over the land.

These financial managers at that distant point can not fully realize the changes or conditions or the difficulties or complaints which arise in the distant regions of the United States. They can not naturally be in sympathy with their people, whom they seldom see and between whom rises a natural antagonism, and the people can not be in sympathy with them. These managers are naturally immersed in their own large affairs, and realize only one side of their great responsibilities. They do not seem to comprehend their true relation and that their primary duties as public carriers are to the public, and that the managements are trustees in this great public responsibility.

Instead of that, the interests of these great controlling powers seem to regard as primary the welfare of the security holders, of their stockholders, and of their bondholders. They seem to have only a secondary interest as to the public, the reverse of the true and well-founded doctrine of the courts and of the legislatures; the reverse of the true doctrine long established and necessary for the public welfare. The people believe that evils exist, that there will be more menacing evils in the future, caused by this misapprehension of public duties by these powerful men, and they demand that we should give proper heed and exercise proper control over these great interests. The only way it can be adequately done is by asserting the paramount affirmative power of the Government in regulating this great public business, by making the public interests superior to the private interests, by creating a public tribunal having power when necessary to fix a rate, to make it effective, and to regulate practices and facilities, all to be subject to proper constitutional and legal limitations and control.

Second, for many centuries, under the doctrine of civil and common law, all sorts of controversies, public and private, difficult and complicated, have been referred to a public tribunal for final settlement, and this tribunal was impartial and uninformed of any of the facts of the controversy until such came before it for determination. In this country many of the public controversies concerning transportation have heretofore been decided by one of the interested parties, the railroad, and all must admit that, on the whole, this most important work has been fairly and adequately performed, as such things go. The great public now believes that it is time that these controversies concerning transportation in various of its phases should be decided, the same as are all other controversies, by a disinterested public tribunal having the authority to settle the dispute and make its judgment effective.

Third. All have admitted that abuses existed which compelled the enactment of the interstate-commerce law nearly twenty years ago. Many of these abuses exist now, and others have since arisen which demand an adequate remedy. It would seem to be the natural, logical, and most effective remedy that where a public tribunal ascertains that a wrong that exists it necessarily is compelled to find the standard of right by which that wrong is adjudged. Then that tribunal, in order to remedy that wrong, upon the same facts, the same argument, and the same operation of mind which ascertains that standard of right and the departure from it as a wrong, should have the power to say "This is wrong; stop it," and have the power to compel the wrong to cease; and to make a complete remedy at the same time to order "This is right; do it," and have the power to make that order effective.

Fourth. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] keenly ridiculed the original message of President Roosevelt advising that Congress confer the rate-making power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to meet the evils of rebates, drawbacks, discriminations, and the like.

The learned and distinguished gentleman referred to this as a model of a non sequiter, and would place it in the texts upon logic as a masterpiece of illogical statement. He evidently has not fully analyzed the situation.

There can not safely be any thorough suppression of rebates and discriminations without there accompanies it some power to fix and control rates by a public tribunal. Favoritism by rebates and discriminations is but the outgrowth and manifestation of extreme unfair, illegitimate competition, out of which, however, the general public gets some share, by reason of a reduction of price or increase of benefits. Otherwise the rebate would not increase the business of the favorite. Favoritism by rebate can not be stopped without correspondingly stopping the competition, which to some degree always benefits the public. But competition will not cease unless some greater power compels it; either the railways or business interests by combination, or the Government by the exercise of adequate and tremendous powers. If the railroads and business interests stop rebates and suppress competition by means of powerful combinations, it puts also in their hands a corresponding power of monopoly and extortion, the only remedy for which would seem to be the still higher power of the Government to fix a rate to stop the extortion, so that the people could enjoy about the same privileges as during the period of competition. So the natural complement of the power to suppress rebates and competition would seem to be the power to fix a rate to prevent extortion.

OTHER PROVISIONS.

The other affirmative provisions of the bill are subordinate, it is true, and yet important.

The committee are confident that they have reached some of the worst features of the private car evils and extortions by charges for mileage and compensation for cars and refrigeration. No measure could meet all evils, but this will cure some of them without doing equal damage to other interests. The power to establish through routes and rates and to lengthen the time for reducing rates is designed to stop various species of favoritism and discriminations, and we are confident that some benefits will be derived from them. We believe the power to compel reports from railroads, to prescribe uniform form of books, accounts, and reports, and especially the power to make examinations of the affairs, whenever necessary, by the expert agents of the Government will have the double effect of discovering some delinquencies and in that way stopping and preventing them, and again by acting as a deterrent, with the apprehension always of a possible discovery, disgrace, cost, and punishment.

We are confident that none of these provisions or powers will injure either the railroad companies or the public. The serious objections to the Esch-Townsend bill are cured in this measure. The rates can not be confiscatory, as the Constitution and courts can in some way and degree protect that under any bill. The rates can not be so rigid and inelastic as not to be responsive to business changes and conditions, because the Commission itself has the power to modify or suspend its order, the courts always have such power, and especially the rate ceases to be effective as a legislative mandatory rate in three years, when it becomes the same as any other rate, changeable by the railroads upon filing the schedules required by law. By these methods neither the railroad nor the public should suffer if ordinary good faith is observed.

OBJECTIONS TO BILL.

Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], with the wonderful power and eloquence for which he is distinguished, stated three fundamental objections to this bill. First, that the Commission by it will have authority to initiate a rate. Second, there is no power of review of the order of the Commission by the courts. Third, the Commission would have authority over differentials. The gentleman from Maine conceives this first objection under the provisions of section 13 of the original law, in connection with the provisions of section 4 of the pending bill. In reading the provisions of this measure he carefully omitted an amendment which this committee proposed to section 13, by enlarging the number of those entitled to make complaint to the Interstate Commerce Commission. This bill adds the words "or upon the complaint of any common carrier." This committee foresaw that some such objection might be made. We were careful in amending the provisions of that bill so to make it clear that only a complaint to the Interstate Commerce Commissions can initiate a legislative rate. This is jurisdictional and goes to the very foundation of the power to act. The fixng of a rate is a legislative act, and the authority to make this act effective is delegated to a Commission, which must work within the scope granted by Congress. It is clearly the intent as well as the language of the acts that this machinery can only be put in motion by a complaint as to an existing situation, thereby pointing out the wrong to be redressed and limiting the scope of the legislative action, which is one of the objects desired to be obtained. The number who might complain is enlarged, clearly showing a necessity for naming those who could initiate complaints. This amendment would have been unnecessary if the Commission itself could start any proceeding, at any time, to fix or charge a rate. The gentleman earnestly contends that the latter clause of section 4—"the foregoing enumeration of powers shall not exclude any power which the Commission would otherwise have in making an order under the provisions of this act"—in connection with the clause of section 13, "that the Commission "may institute any inquiry on its own motion in the same manner and to the same effect as though complaint had been made," will not include the power to initiate.

If he would give the ordinary construction to the two provisions, he would find himself relieved of his great distress.

The clause as to inquiry in section 13 has been uniformly exercised by the Commission to make investigation upon subjects of public importance bearing upon interstate commerce, such as transportation of beef products, flour and grain products, private cars and refrigeration, export and import rates, and many similar subjects. It has not been used as a preliminary step to adjust rates. In this measure the jurisdiction to fix a rate can only be exercised after a foundation has been laid by a complaint to show the wrong and limit the scope; and this jurisdiction will not be enlarged by such strained construction of a provision intended and used for another and far different and useful purpose. The doctrine of the Supreme Court, laid down in the Maximum Rate case, clearly fostered such construction. The court there held that unless Congress clearly provided for the exercise of the tremendous power to fix a rate, that doubtful language will not be construed to so grant it. Here the history of the statute, the action and construction of the Commission, the history and language of the present provisions, the reasons for their existence, and the theory and careful scope of this act all forbid the Commission to fix a rate until after a complaint, an unreasonable rate found, and an order in such case made. There are many other kinds of orders to be made by the Commission besides the order fixing a rate, and the concluding sentence of section 4 of this act was only inserted out of abundant caution that the Commission should not be deprived of its authority to make any such orders. This is the initial power they have, and we want them to have that power carefully preserved. We have no intention of taking it away from them, but we have clearly and carefully taken away from them the power to initially fix a rate.

POWER OF COURTS.

Second. The gentleman from Maine strongly maintained that this bill contains no power to review any order of the Commission as to its reasonableness or lawfulness. It seems very clear to the committee that this measure contains protection for all purposes to the carriers. We could not limit the powers of the courts of this country, and we have not tried to. The provisions of the Constitution of the United States are explicit in establishing a judiciary with full judicial powers, and the courts are always zealous in upholding their own powers and jurisdiction. In addition, section 22 of the original interstate-commerce law provides that "any of the powers of the courts or remedies provided by common law or statute shall not be abridged or altered by means of this act," but that such act shall be in addition to such remedies. The only effect of this measure then will be not to change or deprive of any existing remedies, but not to add any new statutory remedies to those already in existence.

It seems clear to your committee that under existing laws and by means of the provisions of this bill, to which I will hereafter refer, that means, more or less adequate, have been provided to review the orders of the Commission fixing a rate both as to lawfulness and reasonableness.

The only difficulty which appeals to some of us is, not whether there will be provided any power to review the orders, the lack of which terrified the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], but whether under the conditions and circumstances by or in which the matter can be presented to the court there can be adequately and fully considered the various questions as to lawfulness and reasonableness so as to do substantial justice in the case.

Some are sincerely apprehensive as to whether the courts will go far enough in the various proceedings possible under this bill to grant full relief from any oppressive, unjust, and confiscatory act or order of the Commission. Any such question will arise under the laws of the United States, consequently the Federal courts will have undoubted jurisdiction. Where a wrong is committed or claimed to have been committed against persons or property in the enforcement of such laws, the courts generally have found some way to protect the injured.

It may not always be good policy to place such a burden upon the courts, such as adapting old remedies to new conditions. But so far it has been fairly safe, and we believe that reliance can be placed now upon the general power of the courts to redress any wrongs or grievances to our citizens which may arise under our laws. It has seemed to me that there can be reviewed by the courts in some way the following acts or powers, or exercise of power, by the Interstate Commerce Commission:

First. The question of jurisdiction of the Commission to act.

Second. The lawfulness of an order.

Third. The reasonableness and justice of an order.

JURISDICTION.

The question of jurisdiction by the Commission is always an ever-present one. This bill provides that the Commission, whenever after full hearings upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, "shall be of the opinion that any of the rates or regulations or practices are unjust or unreasonable, etc., then it shall make an order as provided by this act."

This language does not provide that the rates, charges, etc., shall be unreasonable or unjust. Such would require judicial action, a judgment or decree of a court having jurisdiction and rendering formal judgment in the case. But the bill does require an opinion of the Commission as to the existence of certain facts and conditions set forth in the complaint and shown upon full hearing. Unless these prerequisites, the complaint, full hearing, and opinion as to certain definite facts affirmatively appear, there can be no jurisdiction to make an order affecting the rate. The opinion, of course, may be erroneous, based upon insufficient facts or the like, and yet not be subject to objection by a court reviewing the order. But if the opinion was a violation of decent and reasonable discretion, if it had no warrant in justice and was manifestly outrageous, it does seem that it could be assailed in the courts.

This is manifestly difficult and almost impossible in many cases, yet it is always a loophole when the courts can review the exercise of discretion of an administrative board.

LAWFULNESS.

Second. It is not controverted, even by the strongest opponents of this bill, that the power exists somewhere in the courts to prevent confiscation of the property of any citizen or carrier by an order of the Commission. Nothing to this effect is specified in this bill; but it is an inherent constitutional power of the courts. The real practical difficulty will be found to be, not in the existence of the power of the courts to act, but whether in so acting they can do full justice in the case. As a general proposition the Commission will make an order affecting only one rate or a few rates, only a very small proportion of the aggregate of rates, and reducing only slightly the aggregate revenues of the company.

The order will probably not reduce the revenues sufficiently to make any one rate or a few rates confiscatory, and so not be reviewable on the ground of lawfulness, even though such reduction be a rank injustice. This review might occur in some few cases involving railroads like the ore roads or coal roads, or even some of the grain roads, but it is not likely to be possible on most of the railroad systems of the country. This trouble is mostly in the inherent difficulty of the subject-matter and not in a defect of power of the court.

REASONABLENESS.

Third. One of the most important questions to be considered is whether it will be possible for the courts to review the action of the Commission in fixing a rate as to its justice and reasonableness. The courts have held that the power to fix a rate for the future is a legislative act, and as such can not be reviewed by the court. The policy of an act of Congress can not be questioned by a coordinate department only when it violates the organic act establishing all the great departments of government.

Congress can not delegate its legislative powers to any other tribunal. It alone must exercise the authority which was granted to it by the Constitution. But it may work out its broad policies by creating and using various tribunals to make effective its directions. Such is the only way that most acts by Congress can be enforced and the only way most of its policies can be made effective.

In this particular instance Congress must exercise its legislative power in fixing a rate.

It can not delegate such great authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to the courts or to the President or anyone else. Since Congress can not well fix the exact rate and charges and regulations in a legislative act, it can only lay down broad general rules and principles, prescribe how such shall be carried into effect, and then provide for some administrative body to make such directions effective.

PROVISIONS OF ACT.

In the case of charges made for transportation of persons and property this act provides:

SECTION 1. That all such transportation shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

This provision, very broad and general, is an entirely proper and constitutional method of declaring a policy, in the opinion of Attorney-General Moody, though his view is controverted by eminent lawyers. In this measure Congress declares, not what shall be exactly the just and reasonable rate for the future, as it might do, but empowers the Commission to—determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed as the maximum to be charged, etc.

This order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier, etc. The effect of this provision is to constitute the Interstate Commerce Commission into an administrative body to carry out the mandates of this act. Its powers are prescribed in this act, and are limited by the provisions of the act. It is not given any purely legislative authority which can not be reviewed by the courts if such powers be exceeded or violated. It is only given a certain power to carry out the will of Congress, and when it fails to do so, to the injury of citizens, some redress must exist to correct it.

In performing such service within the evident scope of its authority, provided by Congress, its orders can not be successfully assailed any more than can the acts of any other administrative department or board be questioned when carrying out the laws for its existence; but its authority is only delegated, and if it violates the laws of its creation, if it exceeds its authority, if it refuse to obey the law limiting it, such disobedience can and ought to be questioned by any party injured by its unlawful acts.

No one can doubt that an act or order of the Commission can be assailed for want of jurisdiction or because it confiscates property in violation of constitutional restriction; and by the same reasoning such an act or order should be also questioned when it exceeds the authority provided by the statutes or violates the limitation or provisions of the act creating it. The Commission can not exceed or depart from the powers delegated to it by Congress, and any such misdoing, when it injures a citizen, should be remedied the same as a violation of the jurisdiction of the Commission or of the Constitution.

Congress has delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission "to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged."

The Commission is not given authority to fix a rate.

The latter is a legislative power, and not reviewable by the courts. But the Commission is given authority to determine and prescribe a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate, in its judgment.

"In its judgment" is the decisive power here which is delegated. It is commanded to make up its judgment as to a rate to be changed; and it is further commanded that such rate must be "just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative." That is the limitation upon its judgment. It is not to exercise its discretion broadly, but within the limits provided by this language. Of course, its judgment can not be reviewed where merely erroneous, unless express legislative authority is given for such review.

But if it clearly and outrageously violates the delegated authority provided in this act, if it grossly exceeds its scope of power, such violations can be corrected. Such abuse of reasonable and fair discretion can be restrained. It would be monstrous to hold otherwise whenever an administrative body, in the exercise of its discretion, clearly limited by law, outrageously and flagrantly exceeds its authority and injures the property of citizens. Such abuses are always restrained and corrected by the courts. The courts will not review any acts within the reasonable scope of the Commission's discretion unless expressly authorized to do so by statute.

But the courts will restrain the Commission's excesses and violations of law. The difficulties always are in the application of these well-known and wholesome rules.

The real difficulty is not in having the authority and remedy, but in making a case, in proving the violation of the delegated power.

For example, Congress has power to declare that a railroad shall have the right to a rate which would insure at least a 6 per cent dividend on its stock, considering that a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate. This sort of an act has been on several statute books and in the charters of several railroads. If the Commission should make an order, under such a law as this, which allowed or should result in allowing only 4 per cent dividend on its stock, is there any question but that the Commission could be brought into court and such an order reviewed as to its lawfulness in not properly exercising its delegated authority, and is there any question but what such an order could be annulled on the ground that its delegated authority had been violated?

I do not believe there is any doubt about it at all. Such an order would be made after full jurisdiction, as provided by law, and it would not violate any constitutional provision, because a return of 4 per cent is not a confiscation of property; but yet it is a violation of the delegated power of the Commission and as such could be reviewed by the courts.

It would hardly seem to require argument that any order of this Commission which adversely affects property rights and which violates the authority of Congress in delegating this Commission authority to do its work can be reviewed in some proceedings in the courts. Now, instead of fixing an exact rate which these railroads can earn, Congress instead may provide that the Commission may prescribe a rate which shall be, in its judgment, just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative. That is the only difference from the case above described.

Of course, the Commission may honestly err and the rates prescribed may not be just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative, and if such action be in good faith, with a reasonable exercise of official discretion, it can not be assailed. But if such honest, reasonable, fair discretion be not exercised, and, among other things, the rates be clearly unjust and unremunerative, it would certainly seem that the courts would have an opportunity to grant redress. It may be a matter extremely difficult to prove, as it is to prove that a single rate is confiscatory, but the opportunity is afforded to make the case and demand the redress.

Now, what remedy is provided? All the remedies which exist under the Constitution of the United States and are commonly exercised by the courts.

Section 16, page 17, of this bill contains a provision authorizing and, in a degree, outlining these remedies. The language, "the venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office." It is clear that this bill contemplates suits against the Commission to set aside, enjoin, annul, or suspend any order of the Commission.

These are the ordinary everyday actions to defend the rights of property, guaranteed by the Constitution and the laws.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the difference between the principal office and the principal operating office, and what does the bill mean by the use of the language "principal operating office?"

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, I suppose that "principal office" might be the principal financial office, which might be, and probably could be, in the city of New York. The principal operating office, as in the case of the Southern Railway, might be in Washington.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it wise to leave it to the question "might be?"

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That would seem to be but one possible construction. The principal operating office is where the actual operation and physical management of the road is directed. We think that is very clear.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where is the operation of the road directed—from what office?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Where the president and general manager and superintendent and those officials issue their orders for the very many things which have to be done in running a railroad. In the case of the Southern Railway it would be the city of Washington.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I understand, the principal offices, like the president's and some of the other great offices, are not always located where the general manager is; in fact, they are hundreds of miles from him sometimes, as I understand it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not think that is true as a rule.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose they were separated, then where is the general operating office?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Where the road has its general managing operating office. For example, the Pennsylvania road, I understand, has its principal operating office in the city of Philadelphia, the Baltimore and Ohio in the city of Baltimore, the Southern Railway in the city of Washington, and the New York Central in the city of New York. I think the Lake Shore has its principal operating office in Cleveland. Those offices would be the principal operating offices and would be the venue of any suits to set aside this order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I had in mind the Illinois Central. As I understand, the president of that road lives in the city of New York, and I am quite sure that the general manager is in Chicago.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The principal operating office of that road would be in Chicago. The headquarters of the Illinois Central are in Chicago, although the president can have his residence in any city where he chooses, and probably the financial headquarters may be in the city of New York. This would illustrate the very distinction made by this provision, that the general operating office may be in the city of Chicago, while the general financial headquarters may be in the city of New York.

Mr. MANN. That term is well known.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; we consider it very clear. As the act was passed to expedite actions under the Sherman antitrust law and the interstate commerce law, it only applied to suits brought by the United States, but this section makes it applicable to any broad litigation described in this section to test the action of the Commission. Again, this measure also provides that the Commission may employ counsel and pay expenses of employment out of its appropriation to conduct these very proceedings, so that every sort of proposition seems to be covered in this bill, so that there shall be a review both of the lawfulness of all orders and the constitutional rights of the carrier and as to whether or not the Commission has conformed to the fundamental law of its existence, in its judgment, in fixing a reasonable and fairly remunerative rate.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Now, if all that is true, what objection could there possibly be to making it plain and putting a provision in the bill that parties aggrieved shall have the right to appeal, under proper restrictions and limitations?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Why, Mr. Chairman, it will be unnecessary. The carrier has that right, under the Constitution, which can not be taken away, and we do not desire to take it away. We desire that the carrier should have scope for redress, and that opportunity exists by reason of the provisions we have given for the advantage of all the remedies provided by the Constitution and statutes.

DIFFERENTIALS.

The gentleman from Maine was greatly exercised about this bill controlling the most important question of "preferentials," as he termed them. If I thought it did give that power I would be just as much exercised as he is. My people are just as much interested that there should not be any undue control of differential rates as the gentleman from Maine, because if any political body should have such authority we should always be in danger of distance tariffs and unwise action compelled by political exigencies. This would either exclude our products from our best markets or greatly reduce the value of our products and our property. But it is just as clear to us and to the whole committee that there is no such power in this bill, which seems to so disturb his soul. The situation presented by the bill and the reasons why differentials are not covered are very simple. Under this bill the Commission would have authority to fix what, in its judgment, would be a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate or rates as the maximum to be charged. It would have no authority to fix an absolute rate, which must be observed by the carrier, and no authority to fix a minimum rate, below which the carrier can not go; and a preferential can not be controlled without there is authority to control absolutely both legs of the differential. In this case the Commission can not control either. It must fix a rate which shall be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative as the maximum to be charged. This leaves the carrier to charge anything it pleases below that maximum. And since there is no power to fix any absolute rate and no minimum rate, there is no power in the Commission to control the relation of rates, and so no power to control the differential. We were extremely careful to take away that power from the Commission, and so all of the evils which were so strongly dilated upon by the gentleman from Maine prove to be only figments of his own imagination. There is no reason for their existence by the terms of this bill. There is another conclusive reason why the differential can not be controlled by the Commission. The rate fixed by the judgment of the Commission must be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative.

The Commission would have no authority to reduce a rate that is already just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative of itself, even if it did constitute a part of a relation of rates which bore hardly upon some community. These two powers—the power of the Commission to limit and fix a maximum rate which must be fair, and when, in addition, it is clearly forbidden to fix an absolute or a minimum rate which prevent control of either of the parties to the differential, I do not see how the intelligence of the gentleman from Maine can possibly construe into this bill a power to control preferentials. He tries to do it under the language of section 4, lines 17 and 18:

Or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial.

Also line 25 et seq.:

And the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the Commission shall find the same to exist.

This language only takes the present act and adapts it to the new powers.

All the Commission could do in making any order to stop preferences would be to go to the court and enforce it just exactly as the present law provides, and the court has no power to fix a rate for the future. It can only stop a violation of law. The Commission has no power to fix a minimum or an absolute rate, and the court has no power to fix a rate for the future; consequently there can be nothing done by the Commission or court in control of differentials, except to stop existing violations of law.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the power proposed to be given there to the Commission to go into court and require the carrier to cease and desist from doing any act in violation of the law any different from the power now conferred upon the Commission?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; the gentleman from Maine said it would not.

Mr. MANN. So there is no additional power given by this bill over the subject of "preferentials," as the gentleman from Maine denominated them, or "differentials," as the railroads denominate them?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The only additional power given by this act to control rates is the power to fix a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate, which shall be the maximum to be charged, and that can not control differentials at all, because the railroads could make any reasonable rate under that. Of course, the language of the present law affects differentials somewhat, and that is not changed or designed to be changed more than that. The rates may be lowered when they are extortionate, and that is just. The relation of rates which constitute the differentials need not be affected by the language of this bill, and the reasons are plain why our committee decided this ought not to be done.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Do I understand under this bill the railroads may make as many unjust discriminations as they please and the Commission would be powerless to correct them?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstood me. Section 3 of the original act applies just the same. We have not undertaken to amend, limit, or extend section 3. Whatever is unjust and discriminatory under section 3 is unjust under the provisions of this bill, and such will be prohibited; but we will not allow the making of a minimum or absolute rate, which is the only adequate way of controlling a differential.

Mr. OLMSTED. I want to ask the gentleman something like this. I intended to ask the gentleman from Maine, but was prevented from doing so.

I happen to own a little farm in Cumberland County, Pa., on a stream rejoicing in the classic name of Yellow Breeches. There are a good many more farms along that beautiful stream and in that country, and it costs us now about the same to get a bushel of wheat to tide water as it does to get it from the gentleman's Minnesota district, fifteen times as far distant. The result of that discrimination and preferential has been to greatly mpair the value of Pennsylvania farms. And while the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] seemed to have in mind only the communities which might be injured by preventing the long haul at the short rate, I represent communities which are injured by the long haul at the low rate. But I wanted to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] if he does not think that they are entitled to some consideration, so that the coal mines in Pennsylvania need not, as I have seen them, lie idle because of the low rate given to coal from West Virginia, where men were able to work for 5 cents a day less than they were willing to work for in Pennsylvania, and therefore shut up the Pennsylvania mines? Whether, if we are going to have regulation, such a community, engaged in agriculture and mining, is not entitled to some protection by this bill as well as those who live at a distance from the market?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That, Mr. Chairman, opens up the great field that your committee seems to have excluded from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is what I am complaining about—that they are excluded.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the rate from the gentleman's farm to its market is just and fair and reasonable, he has no right to complain under the provisions of this bill. I agreed with your colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] that if we attempt to control rates in the way of fixing differentials, in the way of having a political authority designate specially what market shall be had for different sections, we would get into the field of disaster. We have not tried to do so. If the gentleman is suffering from some injury, all he can do under the provisions of this bill, and what he ought to do, is to have an unreasonable rate reduced and a reasonable rate fixed, and that is as far as he can or ought to go.

Mr. OLMSTED. Does the gentleman think it is fair that farm products in my district should be charged for at the rate of ten times as much per ton per mile upon the transportation of wheat and flour as from his district in Minnesota to the same point?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, it must be conceded, Mr. Chairman, that there always is an element of unfairness in such a situation. It may or may not be unfair as to the point the gentleman stated. His rate may be reasonable and fair and just. If so, he can not complain. The relation of rates may injure him. That is one of the things that he and everybody else will have to stand in this country. Somebody is going to be injured by any kind of legislation we pass. If we granted to the gentleman the benefit he desires, we might injure others, and we think we would—ten times as much. What we are trying to do is to injure just as little and benefit as much as we can, and that is why we reduce the power of the Commission to the smallest scope, which shall be fairly effective, as we do by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. But in this bill, while giving the Commission the power to determine what is fair and what is unfair as to certain things, you take away from the Commission the power to decide what would be fair and what would be unfair in such a case as I have mentioned.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But we do not take anything away from them. If there is an unfair discrimination under the provisions of the present law existing, you have the same remedy, if this should become a law, as you did before, and no more and no less.

Mr. OLMSTED. We do not have any more. That is what I am getting at. Ought we not to have more?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No, you ought not, under the present circumstances, because that would bring the evils so eloquently shown by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and your colleague [Mr. SIBLEY], which we realize and desire to avoid. These gentlemen brought in here a host of bogie men; they have brought in phantoms that do not exist, and if they did, would be evils. This bill can not correct all evils and does not pretend to. We only say that we are endeavoring to correct some of them.

Mr. OLMSTED. They may have brought in bogie men, but this is a real character that I have brought in.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; and there are real characters of all sorts all over the United States, but if we attempt to control all of the injustices we find we will get into an illimitable field of greater injustice. So we decided not to try, and limit ourselves to where we believed some good will be accomplished and little harm be done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman this: They use rather of a new word in here, namely the word "remunerative." I have not the bill before me, and therefore can not get the clause, but I wish the gentleman would read it and explain what the word "remunerative" means, what it is intended it should mean, and if he can find any dictionary or any court on the top of the earth that has ever defined the word. I hope that he will have the definition printed in his remarks. And in addition to that, I would like his opinion about it. I would like to know what is meant by it, and why it was put in.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be responsible for everything that is in this bill. It is a compromise measure. There are undoubtedly things in it I do not believe in, there are things in it that every member of the committee does not approve, but we put it in because it is the best that we can do under all the circumstances. Now, as to these particular words, I believe they would have about this effect. We think that Congress has the right to delegate to this Commission the power to name a rate that in its judgment should be just and reasonable which would legally include the words "fairly remunerative." Undoubtedly these would have just about this significance. As I have read the cases, the courts construe that anything less than that is confiscatory of the property affected. Now this makes the legislative definition of what constitutes a reasonable rate correspond exactly with the judicial construction of what constitutes a reasonable rate. This exact power is delegated to the Commission so that this element should be had in mind in fixing a rate. It is one of the elements susceptible of proof in an action testing the order. It would give the railways a little better chance for a standing in court in defining the scope of the authority of the Commission in making the order. It makes the judicial construction correspond with the legislative construction.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The courts have always held that the railroad must be paid for the services it renders. But is it not a fact that that would not in all cases be a remunerative rate? Now, what are you to do with this sort of a case? Say there is a railroad that has been run through some Sahara or unproductive country. You levy a rate for goods through that country that is so high that it does not get the traffic and is not remunerative. Do you call that a just and reasonable rate for the people?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman must understand that the confiscation the Constitution prohibits is the confiscation of all the property, and not by a single rate. The best the Commission could do is to guess at what individual rate would be fair and just. Now, if that particular rate that the gentleman mentions should be fair and reasonable, and yet prove prohibitive to the people of that section, I am afraid the people would have to stand it, unless these new words so obnoxious to him, "fairly remunerative," might be used to compel a change.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Would not that be an unjust and an unfair rate?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That might all depend upon conditions. If the Commission thought it was fairly reasonable, if it was not confiscatory, if it did not come within the scope of the delegated power, I do not believe any power could change it except the Commission. But the rate fixed by the Commission is only the maximum to be charged. The railroad could lower the rate at any time to any which seemed to be best, and in that way carry all the traffic in sight. That is the way it would actually work.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, suppose it would not be a fair rate to the people, the people on that road would not go over it and could not use the road, because the rates were prohibitory.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I can not understand that that would be the result, because the Commission or the railroad would have the right to change the rate. It is not absolutely fixed by either of them. And then the railroad can lower the rate at any time it chooses on thirty days' notice.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But suppose they did not do it? The Commission have said that this rate is remunerative, and it would be reasonable and just also. Now, what power has the Commission to change the rate that it has once made?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The Commission has a perfect right to change its mind under this bill when it thinks it ought to. It can modify or suspend its orders to meet changes of conditions or any exigency in affairs. The courts have the powers I have set forth. But to prevent any cast-iron system of rates, which would tie up the business of the country, the bill provides the rates terminate in three years.

CAN NOT CURE ALL ILLS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we do not expect this bill covers all the evils. It is not passed for that purpose. It is only passed as the best we can agree upon to remedy some of the evils which now exist, and as a basis for other legislation when the proper time shall come to consider it. We are confident it will not afflict people with the evils so strongly described by the gentlemen who have spoken against this bill. And it will do some positive good.

We all realize that this bill will not be satisfactory to many who have clamored for railway rate legislation. Some are even now inveighing against it.

I do not believe it will much reduce railroad rates, since even now our rates in this country average as the lowest in the world. The Commission can not reduce the great bulk of them, and, in fact, the railroads themselves will reduce far lower than any Commission dare go. But it will afford a forum where redress in a speedy and adequate way can be had in a case of extortion, and this is a great gain to the people.

Some special rebates caused by special privileges or facilities, such as private cars, refrigeration, private switches, terminals, elevators and charges, and midnight rates can be under better surveillance and control. But no one must expect that all can be stopped. That would be beyond the limit of human possibility. But this bill will help. Those who believe there should be a control of differentials, who desire a vital long and short haul provision and a distance tariff will be disappointed. There is nothing in this bill as to those particulars to change existing law or existing conditions. Any really grievous evil can be reached now by a vigorous enforcement of the present law. And many of the evils designed to be cured by this bill could be adequately reached under the present law if it were properly enforced.

But there seem to me some fundamental defects in this bill which can not be considered now. I only wish to call attention to them as sometime Congress will be obliged to consider them when the time shall come to amend whatever action shall be had during this present session.

These fundamental evils are two. First, the union of the great powers of government—executive, legislative, and judicial—to some extent in one tribunal. Second, the real basis for rebates, discriminiations, and unjust favoritism is not eliminated or removed by this act.

OBJECTION TO JOINDER OF POWERS.

I agree with the objection made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] as to the joinder of the great powers of the Government, legislative, executive, and judicial, in this Commission. I believe such objection is well founded and that such joinder of powers ought not to exist, and that there can not be a satisfactory and efficient administration of affairs under such conditions. But the time has not yet come to remedy that evil. The time has not yet come when we can revolutionize the interstate-commerce law, procedure, and Commission. We all realize that responsibility for the enforcement of this act must be placed upon an official competent, powerful, and with adequate means to perform his duty. It is the only way we can cope with the great and exceedingly able railway managers and their attorneys. Yet the enforcement of this act is left to the same Commission, which acts to a certain extent as judges and legislators, and no man is big enough to act fairly and efficiently in all capacities. Of course this bill does not and could not confer strictly judicial authority and does not make the Commission into a court. It very carefully avoids that by requiring only the opinion of the Commission to find a rate unreasonable as a basis for action. We all realize that strictly legislative power is not conferred, but only power is delegated to work out the details of the legislative will and make it effective. But quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative powers are conferred upon an executive tribunal, and it is not an effective or satisfactory policy to be pursued. The investigation and prosecutions should be definitely committed to an executive officer and bureau who should have no other duties and the full responsibility. The full judicial power should be committed to the courts, and the legislative power should be worked out by a separate tribunal having no other duties and reporting to Congress, its sole authority.

NO EFFECTIVE REMEDY FOR DISCRIMINATIONS.

Second, the monstrous, menacing evil against which people mostly complain is that of undue favoritism, unfair rebates, discrimination, and advantages to the rich and powerful, as against the weak, humble, and defenseless. The foundation and real basis of them is not reached by this act.

This monstrous evil is caused by undue, illegitimate, unfair competition. The railroads desire more business, and to get business away from a rival will grant rebates to accomplish that end. The shipper desires to increase his business and cut under and out his competitor and makes inducements to the railroad managers to accomplish that result. In both cases is the ever-present desire to overcome a competitor, and both are willing to violate the law whenever they can get that additional business. For many years the only remedies afforded were under the common law, and those injured were compelled to seek redress in the courts through the usual remedies. That method failed, because the injured were not powerful enough to reach the great violators of the law, and there was too little at stake for any one shipper to undertake the expense and chances of a prolonged contest against powerful opponents. The public then sought under the provisions of the interstate-commerce act to fix penalties for violation of the law sufficient to cause such violations to cease. These penalties have been increased and this power to reach the violators is increased. I do not believe this method will be satisfactory or successful, because whenever it will pay the competitor, either shipper or railroad, better to violate than to obey the law, there is always a temptation to violate the law, and the temptation is generally followed by the overt act. This bill can not stop that temptation which leads to the violation.

But the time is coming, Mr. Chairman, when a system should and can be devised by which it will be better for all jointly, railroads and shippers, to comply with the law and assist in maintaining its authority than to violate it, and such a system can be gradually evolved out of this measure after its experiments and experience have disclosed clearly the lines along which such remedial legislation may safely develop.

BENEFITS OF BILL.

This measure will bring about those necessary and beneficial results. First, it will enable a test to be made as to the powers of Congress and the extent of such powers over the interstate commerce and carriers. It gives an opportunity to test the right of Congress to enact this legislation. That right has been doubted in the past. It has been doubted on this floor; it is doubted by many eminent lawyers in the country. This act gives an opportunity to test the constitutionality of such legislation; and then Congress, the public, and the railroads can judge of their respective rights and plan for proper legislation to meet existing situations. Second, it does another thing. It gives to the people an adequate forum where they can go to obtain redress from the wrong of extortion or abuse in the making of rates. One of the main difficulties in the proper settlement of this tremendous question is the fact that the people are prejudiced and, too often, are unwilling to consider conservative and safe methods. It is unfortunate that they are so prejudiced, but this feeling arises because they believe there exists no fair opportunity for redress for them against evils they know exist and against wrongs which they know should be righted. This bill gives that forum and such an opportunity. It gives the people a chance to go to a disinterested tribunal and have the public authorities contest the important questions affecting the public with the great transportation interests of the country. This very fact will prove a safety valve, will tend to remove the prejudices, and the people will be in a frame of mind where they will be glad to receive information and instruction as to these important questions from any source. During the last summer the railroads conducted an extensive and expensive campaign of education in different parts of the country. They caused to be compiled and scattered among the people very many pamphlets, newspapers, articles, and books of great value and authority. But the campaign failed of its intended effect, and did far more harm than good, because the people were not ready to listen to the truth; they were not in a frame of mind to be instructed by the railroad authorities when they did not think the railroads, on their part, were acting fairly and would not consent to before a fair, impartial, and adequate tribunal which could settle all wrongs and disputes.

The railroad authorities seemed to hold themselves somewhat outside of the rules which control other people, and that is always resented by the weaker party.

This naturally suggests the third important benefit of this bill, in that it assures to the public and notifies the railway managers that the public authority is supreme and that all are subordinate to it, that powerful presidents of railroads are subject to the same regulations and powers as the humblest citizen.

It also in effect notifies these managers of these great public-service corporations of the country that above even their own private interests, in the management of the great railway properties, that they are trustees of the people's righs and privileges, and must always be ready to give an account of their stewardship.

One of the great troubles to-day is that these extremely able and powerful men, with all their genius, with all their influence, have not seemed to realize that they are trustees also of the people's rights; that they have responsibilities for the people's welfare.

This bill notifies them that in cases of injustice or in cases of extortion, and that in the exercise of the public function of collecting tolls for public service, that they come under the provisions of this bill, that they are subject to the people's tribunal. When this full realization comes we can expect a cordial cooperation between the railroads and the public in protecting and advancing all interests. Until such time there must continue to be friction. We believe this bill will hasten the coming of the time when the railroad authorities will be sincerely desirous of cooperating with the public authorities in studying the various phases and elements of this vast and complicated question.

This most important work is needed in the operation of the railroads. It is needed in the enforcement of any laws upon the statute books. It is needed in the settlement of the important controversies which must arise over these most important questions. It is needed in planning for any legislation which may be found necessary in the future.

The greatest and most valuable part of such work can be done by the able, practical men who know the most about it, and their sincere labors can be effective when the people and public authorities all realize and can depend upon it as contributing to the public welfare. This legislation is by no means the final step. It is only a short but important step in advance. Other very important steps must be taken in the future. We have gone as far as possible just now. But under the protection of this legislation it ought to be possible to study carefully and clearly the true and best relations of the railroads and their management, to the public, to their security holders, and to their employees, study the methods and effects of publicity, operation as affecting all interests, and analyze the elements of charges, cost of service, and compensation, and reasonable rates. In the preparation of the present legislation the railway managers have not been as frank and fair in some respects as was due, and when some were frank and fair such qualities did not receive adequate response and commendation. This natural distrust should be dissipated by the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Can I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. On page 13 of this bill, part of section 16, beginning at line 8, provides:

> Such suits shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that on the trial of such suits the findings and order of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, etc.

That is where a judgment for damages has been awarded by the Commission against the individual shipper and he has appealed to the court for enforcement of the order. I want to know whether or not that language does not give the attorney for the corporation the close of the argument to the jury in every instance?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think there may be much to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. I have since seen, I think, some cases that hold that such provision does change the burden of proof. I think the best authorities—and I confess I have not investigated the subject carefully—I think the best authorities are to the effect that this only furnishes the proof necessary to make out a prima facie case and does not change the burden of proof. At the same time, I remember reading a case only last week which held that this very sort of a provision did change the burden of proof.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Wherever the law gives one litigant a prima facie case in my State it invariably gives the other litigant the conclusion of the argument.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It would be held that the practice of the State would control; but as to that, my opinion is not of value. I have seen cases which held that it did change the burden of proof, and the contention of the gentleman would be true; but at the same time I think that the better authorities are to the effect that this only furnishes the needed evidence to make a case and does not change the burden of proof.

Mr. PEARRE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. PEARRE. Is there any specific prohibition against the granting of rebates in this bill or any specific penalty provided for the granting of rebates?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is in previous existing legislation. The old interstate-commerce law and the Elkins law covered rebates thoroughly, and this gives additional power to prevent extortions.

Of course, the language of the bill extending the scope of the Commission in the way of including private cars, refrigeration, switches, elevators, and terminals, which are only a convenient way of rebate, are covered in the bill, and in that way the question of rebates is well covered.

Mr. PEARRE. In regard to the matter of rebates, the committee relies entirely on the Elkins law?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no.

Mr. PEARRE. Without any specific provision in this bill with regard to that matter at all, except the provision which prohibits the charging of anything but the published rates. Am I right about that?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is all that can be done. We provide that the rates shall be fair and reasonable; that the rates shall be published, and make a penalty for departure from those rates, and we try to include in this bill, so they can be controlled, various evasions by which there have been departures from the published rates. That is the object of the extension of this legislation—of preventing departures from the published rates.

Mr. PEARRE. I may say to the gentleman that my observation and experience has been in discussing this bill with citizens throughout the States and country wherever I have been, that common observation and experience is to the effect that what the people want is a prohibition and prevention of rebates and discriminations, especially. Some men, indeed, have written me on this subject—men engaged in large business interests and largely in interstate commerce—that what was needed and what they did not object to was the prohibition and prevention of rebates—that is, discriminations in favor of one shipper as against another. It seems to me from my reading of this bill that there is no specific provision in it which either prohibits rebates or furnishes any penalty for the granting of rebates.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, such provisions as the gentleman demands have been on the statute books for nearly twenty years. The lack of sufficient means for enforcement was the reason for the passage of the Elkins law, and we attempt to extend the provisions of the old statute—the original interstate-commerce law—which made every prohibition desired by the gentleman and his constituents, by including other methods of rebates and unjust discriminations and unfair advantages. That is what this does, specifically, in the first section. It extends existing provisions and prohibitions of law. We have covered it just as fully as we could, have gone just as far as human ingenuity can go by making everything that constitutes a departure from the published rates, everything that grants unjust favoritism, a rebate and unlawful, and it must be read in connection with existing law.

Mr. PEARRE. Then I understand that the gentleman does admit that there is nothing specific in this bill except by reference to previous legislation and by the confirmation and extension of previous legislation.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly, the gentleman must read sections 2 and 3 of the original interstate-commerce act and he must read the acts passed in 1903—the Elkins law—in connection with this legislation.

Mr. PEARRE. I say this extends and amplifies those.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. PEARRE. I desire the gentleman to understand that I am heartily in favor of this legislation, but I do not want, while we are passing this legislation, to overlook what appears to be the principal objectionable features in the minds of the public, namely, rebates and discriminations.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is the one thing that we have covered as far as we can cover against rebates. Rebates will be made. We can not prevent them. This bill goes as far as we can go. It does the best we can do, and if the gentleman and his constituents will cooperate with the public authorities in the enforcement of this law very many of the evils the people complain about will be remedied. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I am suffering from the effects of a very bad cold. I shall not, therefore, be able to speak with a great deal of force, and I shall probably develop the fact that I am again somewhat inconsistent in my position. The debate which has been running now for a week has been one of the most interesting that I have ever listened to in the course of my service here. It has been marked by extraordinary ability on both sides of the question, and if I should say something on two or more sides of the question in the course of the time which I occupy it will not be a novelty, so far as that is concerned, to a good many Members of the House.

I consider the agitation that has emanated from Congress and has spread itself out over the country as uncalled for and injurious. There never was an issue so feigned and so much a "fake" issue as the issue of an agitation to be called rate agitation. There was no such condition until it was manufactured here. There is no such condition excepting only as it has been planted, nursed, promoted, and propagated from the halls of political debate, and the agitation of a few gentlemen in the country is giving it notoriety by the action which they have taken. I live in a great shipping district. I venture to say there is more interstate-commerce freight shipped out of the district that I have the honor to represent than there is out of one-third each of all the States of this Union. And yet, coming up to this moment, not one letter, not one newspaper editorial, not one suggestion has come to me in regard to this subject, and I venture to say that of the 386 Members of this House 300 of them will testify the same way. That the public have been aroused by the organized cry of outrage against the railroads there is no doubt, and the people have been brought to believe that they have been most seriously imposed upon; but on a close analysis they will discover that it has not been the rates charged, but the manner in which the discriminations have been made that has done the injury to them.

I was alive in the campaign of 1904. The Democratic party injected this idea into the platform of their party. The Republican party treated it then just exactly as it has always treated it—with entire indifference, if not contempt. I participated more or less in the campaign in fifteen States, and I read the great journals—leaders of the thought of the people—published in behalf of the Republican party in all of the States. I read the platform of the party at Chicago, and I read the letter of acceptance and the speech of the President, and there was not one solitary utterance in the whole of it that said one word about this lower tariff of rates in the United States, so I am justified in saying it is a manufactured issue, uncalled for, totally and absolutely unnecessary. But it has come, and when you hear appeals coming from the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] telling us that the wrath of the people has been aroused and punishment is to be meted out and we are threatened with some dire calamity, everybody who even goes slow about this proposition, why, we are awake to the probable consequences of not doing anything.

There are some shippers in various parts of the country from whom these demands come, but I have never read a resolution of a shippers' convention that complains generally of the result of the rates of freight in the United States. That is not what they talk about. I will come directly to what they do talk about, and I will try to make it apparent that the distinguished gentlemen who have reported this bill have absolutely omitted to discuss or legislate upon every question that is of the slightest importance to the shippers of the country. [Laughter.] It has been a noteworthy fact that of all the distinguished gentlemen of the committee who have advocated this bill no two of them have answered the same question in the same way. Notably the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], who has just taken his seat, feels grave uncertainty as to whether there is anything at all in the bill in regard to the very thing above all other things that we are so greatly interested in, the question of discrimination, the question of rebates, the question of faulty and extortionate administration of the great question of transportation in the United States, and when they come to be cross-examined on this floor no two of them answer the same question in the same way. Some of them hope there is something satisfactory in the measure; some of them hope that a construction will be given to this bill that will satisfy the cross-examiner; some of them are of the opinion that this is probably not quite definite, that——

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman is willing to admit that there is a remarkable degree of versatility on the part of the committee, at least?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; of versatility and some other—well, there is great versatility, there is no doubt about that. Others hope that that was in the bill. Another one said, "Well, I must confess that is not in the bill." Another one said, "Well, I think it is in the bill;" and when you come to look at it with a spyglass you can not see it. I remember very well that when the Esch-Townsend bill was pending in the last Congress a distinguished gentleman who advocated in a leading position the passage of the bill was called upon to state whether or not there was any provision in the bill that undertook to regulate or affect any way rebates and discriminations, and finally he said he thought there was, and then he pointed out that the Interstate Commerce Commission might hear complaints against these "practices" of the railroad companies, and he said that was the place where rebates were covered; that was the place where all those injurious actions of the railroad companies were going to be met.

Now we have a bill far less definite than that, and at last the gentleman from Minnesota is driven to say that whatever there is in this bill that in anywise affects these great evils that we all recognize and complain of, that if there is anything in the bill that affects them in any way, it is by giving a little more power to the Elkins Act. How long would it take a skillful man to put into the bill something that we could understand—that is, the average of us? Why could not you say in this first section that undertakes to describe what shall be the duty of a railroad company, why not say in plain terms that they shall not do this and that and the other thing, and if they do do it that shall be a violation of the law for which they shall be punished? Why leave it to misconstruction? Why leave it all to be guessed about and to be construed apparently for the purpose of passing this bill?

But this bill is born of the dawn of a political millennium in this House. All the angels that sang together here on the day this bill was reported sang the same tune. [Laughter.] Men who have stood here and denounced the Elkins bill as totally valueless and denounced the interstate-commerce act as faulty come here now and say that while they can not point out that this bill has made any change in the law yet they are all for it. Then, Mr. Chairman, there is a most notable proposition here. While it is true that these eighteen gentlemen, or seventeen, or whatever there may be of them—the very ablest men in this House, I grant that—while it is true that no two of them think alike about the details of this bill, they stand together as a close corporation and say, "We have pledged ourselves that there shall not be any amendment put on this bill." A half a dozen of those gentlemen have told me, "Yes; that is the thing." One of them told me to-day—and he would not object if I named him, I think—"Well, if you fellows get at it, you will destroy it."

So the whole power of the proposition is to be brought to bear to prevent any amendment to this bill. That is the most remarkable proposition. My friend from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] had something to say on a cognate subject a few days ago that had a good deal of force.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And I would like to have had the aid of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is not a political question, only as our friends on the other side are trying to make it such. It is a question of business. It is the matter of the administration of the greatest question of American industry to-day, and yet we are told that the absolute perfection of legislation has been reached; that nothing can be added to or subtracted from. It is perfect in all respects, and therefore must not be criticised. In the name of common sense, what are we doing here five or six days at a stretch and now running on into the second week? What are we making speeches about? What are we making speeches for? If we are forbidden to amend this bill, and this close corporation stands armed, as I think it does, with ample power to prevent any change in this bill, what are we here for? Why not go home, and when these gentlemen have placed the matter right before their constituents, by diverse sophistical speeches, come back and register their will, and pass the bill?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I do not think I have ever interrupted him before.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman has recollection of a bill coming, a few days ago, from the Committee on Ways and Means, of which the gentleman is a very distinguished member, and that the bill was discussed in the House for many days; and, under a rule that the gentleman was able to give us as a member of the Committee on Rules, no amendments were permitted, notwithstanding there had been debate covering a period of a number of days.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And, Mr. Chairman, before that debate began the House adopted the rule, and made it, therefore, the act of the House itself. Here we have the act of a committee without any indorsement of the House, and we are told without any action whatever on the part of the House we shall not be permitted to make any amendment to the bill. The gentleman is sufficiently acute to see very easily the wide distinction between the two propositions. The Committee on Rules might have been overruled in that case. The Committee on Rules has not anything to do with this case, nor has any Member of this House got anything to do with it, because the edict has gone solemnly forth that no amendment is to be put into it. If we should bring Christ's Sermon on the Mount and offer it here as an additional section to this bill it would be opposed by every man on the committee because of his relation to the bill.

Mr. MANN. That would not be germane to the railroads.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not within the power of the House to amend it, and if it was not in the power of the House, under the rule that was adopted on the Philippine tariff bill and the statehood bill, to ever consider amendments?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly. It is in the power of the House. I am not talking about having taken away any power of the House, but it is the declaration of the committee that they have got a perfect measure that I am criticising—a measure so perfect that although it has been born of a compromise with eighteen men it is not to be successfully attacked by the three hundred and seventy-odd Members. That is my point.

Well, then we must vote for this bill or not vote for anything. We must vote for this bill exactly as it comes from the committee or we shall mar and spoil the handiwork that is so absolutely perfect in its character, and yet which is condemned or criticised by more than half of the men who aided in its birth and procurement. Now, I do not believe that this is by any manner of means perfect. I heard the statement of the very able gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] a short time ago, that undertook to say that the first section of this bill strengthened the power of the Elkins bill. Now, my proposition is this: If the Elkins bill has sufficiently described the crimes that are committed against the rights of the people of the country by railroad corporations, then there is not any need of this legislation, and the whole of this argument that has been made here so fairly and so ably about the wrongs that the railroads are perpetrating against the people of the United States comes down to just simply nothing except the question of the reduction of railroad rates as the tariff for the transportation upon the railroads of the country.

There is not one single word or syllable in the first section of this bill that in anywise points out or in anywise elaborates the scope of the Elkins bill. The mere definition of the words covered by the term "railroads," of what is covered by the term "common carriers," and what is covered by the term "transportation" adds nothing to the Elkins bill; for the Elkins bill has a better and more pertinent and more comprehensive and a better understood provision in the description than this bill. You have added nothing whatever.

Now, my proposition is this: We are here trying to legislate against wrongs and injuries done to the American people by the railroad companies. The Elkins bill was a supplement upon the interstate-commerce bill. I voted against the interstate-commerce bill away back yonder. I was one of the twenty-six Members of this House who believed then that the bill was of no possible value, and was nothing but an incumbrance and an obstacle in the way of success in regulating the matter of railroad traffic; and I have been pretty well vindicated. I find that gentlemen are here telling us the wrath of the people is rising. The Interstate Commerce Commission is still there, all its functions are there, all its functions largely added to by the Elkins bill, and yet they say it is totally defective and worthless. One year ago we had the Esch-Townsend bill. Great pains were taken and great efforts were made to bring that bill up to a point that would meet the emergency. How many men here to-day would vote for it if that bill were here? and I was one of them that voted for that bill. They would not vote for it again. So we have gone through these statutes and this interstate-commerce bill, an utter and insignificant failure and absolutely worthless and deterrent by reason of its own defects. Second, the Elkins bill is now condemned as inefficient and worthless. Third, this bill. Has the Elkins bill failed to correct the evils that it aims at? Has it failed to prevent rebates? Will not some gentleman here tell us where there are any rebates going on to-day? It is broadly stated by the leading men of the railroads of the country, that do not advocate this bill, and whom I shall refer to ultimately, that while there were rebates and wrongs in that direction, to-day there are none. Is not the Elkins bill as strong in its language as the English language can make a measure in condemnation of rebates? Will somebody state what language could be put in that bill to make it stronger? And if some advocate of this bill says that the Elkins bill is not specific enough, not strong enough, not clear enough, and not effective, and has been found to be defective, why not strengthen the Elkins bill by clear and concise and easily understood language in this bill? You have not done so.

And do not tell me that the mere section defining the term "railroad" and defining the term "transportation" has added anything to the statute known as the "Elkins law" as a definition of the criminal act of rebate. So I say that gentlemen are driven to this proposition by the utter inefficiency of this bill to enlarge even the description of rebates and to add anything to the punishment or any definition that makes it in the slightest degree valuable. For they have admitted that they are willing to retire from the business and leave the Elkins bill the sole occupier of the field so far as punishment or definition of rebates is concerned.

Now, I do not believe myself that the Elkins bill has reached the limit, and I had hoped when the language of the statute was restated here we should have something more definite and something more valuable. The great trouble in this country grows out of the consolidation or interweaving of the interests of the producer and the transporter. That is our real trouble. And I speak from personal knowledge of where I live and where I observe and where I know what is going on, and I say that the great evil to-day grows out of the fact that the railroad corporations are permitted to become, through their directors, through their presidents, and through the superintendents, owners of the productive industries along the lines of the railroads. That is the real trouble. Going to the mighty coal fields of Ohio, 40 per cent of the entire production of coal in the State—and Ohio is fourth in the production of soft coal—is mined within my own Congressional district, and the evil we are suffering from, and battling against in the State courts with some success, which we could battle better in the forum of the United States courts, is where the coal mines are owned by the railroads. I could give instances one after the other and I could name an instance in the State of West Virginia where the owners of the railroads are the people owning the most productive coal mines along its lines, and strangling to death the business of other shippers along its lines. There is no provision in this bill that seeks to reach out in the direction of that crowning evil that is so disastrous.

And, Mr. Chairman, although I have been notified that it will not be passed, I shall offer an amendment, if I am present in the House, at the proper time, which, in my humble judgment, will reach and correct the evil.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CURRIER). Does the gentleman desire the amendment read at this time?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, Mr. Chairman, as a part of my speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

No president, director, officer, agent, or employee of any railroad or other carrier of freight, and which is engaged in interstate commerce, shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in the furnishing of material or supplies to such company or in the business of transportation as a common carrier of freight or passengers over the works owned, leased, controlled, or worked by such company. Upon complaint and satisfactory proof of any violation of this provision such Commission shall order that the offices so held in violation of this act shall issue an order to such corporation to declare the offices or position so forfeited vacant, and to fill the places so vacated as is provided for in the organization and by-laws of such corporation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, there is not anything novel about this; nothing startling. I have copied the exact words of the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania. If that had been in force in the State of Pennsylvania, the enormous coal strike of three years ago would not have happened. If that was in force to-day in the great coal-producing States of the Union, the strike of 600,000 coal miners that now stand menacing the industries of this country would not have been suggested, because there would have been no contest between the opposing interests. This is the law of Pennsylvania to-day in substance and effect. The only difficulty about the constitution of Pennsylvania is that there is a question of the refusal of the State legislature to pass laws to carry into effect this organic act.

There is one section of this article of the constitution which I will read:

SEC. 12. The legislature shall enforce by proper legislation the provision of this article.

But they have never enforced it. There it stands, a monument of the wisdom of the Constitution makers and a monument of the potential influence of the coal operators. [Laughter and applause.]

There is one of the propositions. Is that covered by the Elkins law? What have you done in this bill to carry it into effect if it is not covered by the Elkins law and ought to be adopted?

What right have you to stand and say it shall not be put into this bill? It is a very simple provision? Why, it is said, and my colleague from Ohio after having gracefully yielded to my suggestion as to some of the things he said in a former speech, has finally come down to the conclusion that the most that can be said about the railroad company is that it is an instrumentality of commerce; that while not exactly owned by the State, it is in a position to be dictated to as to its organization and as to its administration.

If that be so, and I agree to it, then what is to hinder the Congress of the United States from saying to this great railroad corporation, "You shall be public servants, and if you want to invest your money in running a railroad, you shall run it under such conditions as shall not challenge your cupidity, and challenge your disposition to commit outrages against the rights of the producing forces along your line. You shall be the agent for the transportation lines." Why, throughout the whole country we make laws in every State of the Union saying what manner of man shall hold office, what manner of man shall administer the legal offices of the country. We say the same thing—we provide that no man shall hold an office that has been created during his term as Congressman until it is ended, and we put all sorts of regulations on the instrumentalities of our administrative branch of the Government. Why not say to this corporation that if it takes the franchise with the right of eminent domain, "You may go into the business of transportation, you may carry coal and iron and steel, farm products and cattle, but you shall not have an interest in the production of it, for the very reason that we will not consent that there shall be such an unfair advantage given to an owner of a railroad company."

There isn't anything new or novel about that. We all understand the power of it. Why wasn't it put into this bill if the Elkins law has failed and is worthless?

Then there is a little matter, a very small matter, that I would like to inquire into. I have not undertaken to exhaust the subject of improvements that might be made to remedy the evils that we complain of and that we have a right to complain of. Why not put it exactly this way:

Any railroad company upon whose line there is a coal mine, or sawmill, or a shipping point of cattle shall furnish to every man on the line the same facilities, the same right of transportation, and every other thing that goes to make this property valuable, and if you do not do it we will suspend your charter and turn you out.

Why, we have got power enough in the State. Some of my friends have forgotten that there are States in this Union. [Laughter.] Not long ago a railroad company in the State of Ohio undertook, in relation to a transaction, to discriminate against the operators that had put down shafts and erected coal tipples to start in and mine coal.

There is no law in Ohio on the subject. The railroads refused to take on the switch when it was ready, and yet they did take on another switch after that one had been constructed that took in a tremendous output of coal, and which belonged to the officers or stockholders of the railroad company, or in which they had interest. A suit was brought in a State court, and for what? Not for damages, but a proposition to oust the corporation from its legal existence, and that under no law except the common law applicable to all common carriers. The result of it was, when they had quibbled long enough and delayed a little while, they came down very gladly and took on the switch. Those are the evils we are complaining about. I happen to know something about the conditions in the State of West Virginia, and there is another evil there that I desire to instance in this connection.

A great trunk line of railroad had attached onto it a little short line running up a creek, at the upper end of which was a big coal operator, the owner of a few miles of railroad along the line below him, where there was another mine. There was coal mines open, and after a while it was discovered that the upper mine was getting rich and crowding the markets of Cincinnati and Chicago and the lower mine was pining for the want of profits and dying. When they came to look into it they found that they were each charged exactly the same price—they paid the same price from the upper mine that they did from the lower mine. The rate was the same; but what else was done? When the upper mine settled their freight account at the end of the month they were paid back a rate of freight that made their operation profitable, while it starved the others to death. I could prove that by my friend here from West Virginia if I were to give the location and mention the names. A young man friend of mine who had invested his money in the matter came to me and I told him off-hand to get out of it and save what money he could, and he did. Now, why could not they put into a bill like this, seeking to answer a great demand that is growing, by which we have been threatened by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], the wrath of the people which is going to be hurled at anybody for having even an opinion on one of these amendments—why couldn't they put into this bill, if the Elkins law is not sufficient, something that would make it efficient and sufficient? I maintain there is not one word here that is added to or subtracted from the Elkins law. There is one other little matter that I desire to talk about. There has been some genius in the drawing of this bill. If it has not been studied genius, it has been a wonderful accident that has happened to it. If there is in these United States of America a corporation that is absolutely soulless and absolutely lawless it is the Pullman Palace Car Company. Now listen to me. We are undertaking to regulate now the transportation of passengers in the United States. We are undertaking to see to it that everybody shall have a square deal, as it is said. I do not know anything about a square deal. I know something about a fair deal, but the square deal is something that I don't understand.

Why don't we go after the Pullman Palace Car Company? What have they done that they should be eliminated from all regulation and control? Some of the members of this committee say that those regulations are here, and that the Pullman Palace Car Company is included. I desire to show how ingeniously they are not included. Turn, if you please, to the first section of the bill. Here is a bill that undertakes to be definite and absolutely certain, and I am sorry to say it is. This looks as though it might have been accidental; I hope it was. It is a bill of definitions.

> The term "railroad," as used in this act, shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease, and shall also include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of persons or "property."

Now, watch the word "property," for that is going to become important. After a little they come to the question of what "transportation" is on the third page and what it would be to be a violation of this law, and here they say:

> And the term "transportation" shall include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipments or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration, or icing, storage, and handling of property transported.

The very ingenious and unnecessary use of that word "property" at that place excludes the Pullman Palace Car Company from the operation of the law totally and absolutely, and yet some gentlemen on the committee tell me that that is included, and they are sure it ought to have been included and so am I. Why not say so? Why not leave out the word "property" there and then you have it exactly covered by the first subdivision of the section; but suppose they do not want to do that, but put in the words "including especially palace sleeping cars and dining cars?" They have been very elaborate in their description of the other instrumentalities, but they have been very cunning in eliminating or else raising the question as they have all through this bill. So much for that. It is a matter of very small importance, only it shows how little we have got out of this bill at last, notwithstanding how widely the idea has been promulgated that all the ills that flesh is heir to in this country are to be cured by these provisions.

This is called a "rate bill," and yet when the President is approached by a labor organization that represents an overwhelming moral influence in this country he tells us, or tells them and we read and appreciate it, that it is not intended to cut down the income of the railroad, that they need not have any alarm about that, and yesterday or the day before the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who ought to be as well acquainted with the provisions of this bill as anybody else, having been a faithful worker in the interest of it from the beginning, said in his public speech here on the floor of the House, there is not to be any reduction in the revenues of the railroads, that the laboring men need not have any fears, that the profits of the railroads are to be just the same, that there will be no reduction in the revenues whatever.

Mr. Chairman, in the language of a gentleman in one of our Chicago conventions, "In the name of common sense, what are we here for?" [Laughter.] What are we here for? What are you trying to do? You have no proposition to raise any freight rates, have you? Are you going to raise the freight rates? Is there some shipper somewhere who is to be mulcted in higher rates of freight, or do you not intend that there shall be any instrumentality here put in the form of law that shall cut down the rates of freight anywhere? The income of the railroads is the income that is derived from freight and passenger fares and the carrying of express packages and all the other incidentals, and if you are not going to cut down and circumscribe their income, what are we doing? What is it for? Dare you say that it is the purpose of this bill to increase freight rates in some directions? Dare you? Then, will you not say it is your intention to cut down any freight rates anywhere, for if you cut down any in order to keep you word good that you have pledged, now, to the labor interest of the country, you have got to raise them somewhere. There you are. There is an absolute stultification of the position in which you have placed yourselves.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is any political power, any political organization on the face of this earth, which can confer the general rate-making power upon that political organization that will not inside of five years so demoralize and break up the harmonious system of to-day that it will carry consternation to the industrial interests of the country. It is not going to affect, it can not affect, the section of the country which I represent considerably, for there is nothing in the bill which reaches our trouble, but when you come to adjusting freight rates you will find that the center of the country will be safe and sound and the extremities of the country will be in a woeful condition. If this bill goes into law, and I hope it may not, I should like to go down into Texas and Alabama two years from now and ask those gentlemen how they are getting along with a uniform system of freight rates. Why, ever since I was old enough to know what a railroad was made for I have always understood that a railroad was fitted to carry commodities, and that the people would be benefited by competition in rival railroad lines.

That has been the cry of the people of this country, and that is why we built the Southern Railroad with the money of Cincinnati—built it for the purpose of having a competing line against the Louisville and Nashville and other railroads, and the competition in freight rates has brought this low standard of freight, less to-day than one-third of some of the great countries of Europe, all of which has been brought about by competition. Now comes a sweeping proposition that every sane man knows is the absolute end of all competition. Let somebody tell me now in the closing days of this debate how you are going to have competition under this law—how you are going to have it. The very moment that line A undertakes to cut the rate line B will enjoin them through the instrumentality of this rate-making power. Why, a few years ago—there are very few Members here now who were here then, and it has been only a short time ago—all the railroads in the country worked out a plan, that seemed to be advisable to me, to permit pooling. It was very simple, except that it put an end to competition. It simply permitted the great lines of railroad running to the Pacific Ocean or anywhere else to join in an agreed tariff of rates.

Then upon that agreement the income was to be parcelled to the members of the pool. A cry went up all over this country quite equal to that which is emanating from this Capitol of the great outrage that was being done to the people of this country in permitting the pooling of freight rates. A distinguished Senator of the United States said it was a great trust that was being formed. Now, I have lived, first, to see that bil ldefeated, for which I voted, and I have lived to see the time when the whole American public apparently are demanding a bill that in natural operation and effect is nothing more or less than a great national pooling scheme. That is what it is. Competition is forbidden, competition is strangled. All the rates in given directions and from given points to given points are to be uniform. What is that but a system of pooling? And so we are coming to that much-decried and much-abused pooling bill that was cried down.

I had intended to say something about some of the extraneous, outside, ornamental arguments that have been made in favor of this bill. When I was a young lawyer we had a famous judge in our State, Judge Nash, the author of some works on law and other things, and I tried a case in which I was defending a man for a high crime. I had rather of a slim case. After it was over the old gentleman criticised my way of doing business, and said, "You have caught on to some of the points pretty early. In these ugly cases, where you have nothing else to go on, abuse the prosecuting attorney." It is fashionable nowadays, when you have nothing else to go on, to abuse the Standard Oil Company.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I thought the gentleman was going to say, to abuse the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; they are the most ingenious men I ever knew and the ablest men I ever knew. I do not abuse them; I point out how they have hedged us in, and how hopelessly powerless we are to extricate ourselves. That is all. It takes genius to do that in the House of Representatives of the United States, and my friend, if he has had a hand in it, can congratulate himself that he belongs to one of the most successful organizations for the propaganda of his own ideas that ever existed on the face of the earth. [Laughter.]

That is where he stands. There is no trouble about that. The question of trusts has not a great deal to do with the present case, when we find that the bill itself is not aimed at any rebate or anything else except the question of fixing rates, a question that has had no agitation in the country until it emanated from here. It is the offspring of a suggestion that the country is suffering under something that needs reformation, and it has stirred the country up. Yet, as I said in the opening, I have never heard a word from a constituent of mine. I take it as a very high compliment, for I take it as a matter of course that the people of my district are suffering, too, just like all the rest of them, driven almost to frenzy, looking forward to bankruptcy and starvation, and yet complacently depending upon their Member of Congress to do the right thing without any suggestion from them. [Laughter.]

Well, what shall we do with this bill? We are not to be allowed to amend it, and we have either got to vote for it or against it. My opinion is that the quicker it gets out of this House and gets somewhere else, where the ironclad is not quite so binding as it is here, the better it will be for all of us.

And so, having made these few remarks, Mr. Chairman, expressing my opinion of the outline and character of this bill, I will aid to get it out of the House of Representatives just as fast as possible. [Laughter and applause.]

[Mr. LAMAR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, new conditions require new laws. The conditions of to-day demand an effective governmental control of all railway rates.

There was a time in the history of the commerce of this country when the competition of railway companies contending for the transportation of freight and passengers regulated the rates and charges of the contending companies, but that day has passed, the ownership of transportation lines is now concentrated in the hands of a few men, and the rate is charged that the traffic will bear.

The competition of markets continues as long as competitive markets are served by competing carriers, but competition as a regulator of railway rates and as a protector against unreasonable and unjust rates has proven a failure in every country in which railway systems have been developed.

All of the great nations of the earth save two (France and the United States) have adopted some governmental system for the control of railway rates. In the United States the Congress passed a law in 1887 that was intended to give the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to control rates, and it was so exercised by the Commission for eleven years, when the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1898, declared that the powers granted by Congress were only advisory.

In Great Britain the board of trade has control or regulates within certain limits the railroad rates. In Ross's British Railways: Their Organization and Management (London, 1904), this statement is made:

> Section 31 of the railway and canal traffic act (1888) provides that if a man thinks a railway is charging him at an unfair or unreasonable rate for the goods he sends by it, or is in any way treating him in an unfair or unreasonable manner, he may complain to the board of trade, and that department, if the complaint seems reasonable, will call upon the railway for an explanation of its action. Further, the railway and canal commissioners, by section 10 of the same act, are empowered to hear and determine any dispute as to the legality of any toll, rate, or charge for merchandise traffic, and to enforce payment of so much as they decide to be legal.

In France the railroads are operated by private companies, which have concessions from the State. The proposition of Government ownership in France has been much debated, but has not resulted in any change of the system. A brief statement of the financial relations between the State and the railways is given in the British Diplomatic and Consular Reports, annual series, No. 3172, pages 16 to 22.

In Germany the principal railroads are owned and operated by the State. There are some private lines, but they are under Government control.

In Switzerland the railroads have just been taken over by the State in accordance with the law of 1897, which took effect in 1903.

In Italy the railroads have just come under Government ownership and control.

In Austria-Hungary the Government owns and operates most of the railroads. A general survey of the railroad system of Austria-Hungary, with statistical tables showing the operations for a series of years, is given in Diplomatic and Consular Reports of Great Britain, annual series, No. 3343.

In Belgium most of the railroads are owned and operated by the Government. A few lines are owned by private interest, but are under governmental control.

The argument has been advanced by those who are opposed to this legislation, both in the Congress and outside of it, that governmental control of railroad rates by the German Government has paralyzed the railroads and that the railroads have paralyzed the industry of the country; that to get away from the railroad monopoly they had created they were compelled to develop their river and canal system, creating a new monopoly to overthrow the old one. I do not confess this argument, I do not admit that industry is languishing in the German Empire; but I do concede that when they adopted a system of freight rates without limitation as to time or provision for changes to meet changing conditions they made a serious mistake, with the result that the shippers of the country who had been benefited by these rates claim they have made future contracts based on the existing rates, and thereby preventing changes to meet the growing demands of new markets. But this objection can not possibly apply to the terms of the present bill, for it provides that when a rate is fixed by the Commission it shall only last for three years and may be sooner changed by the Commission.

With all the abuse we hear heaped on the German system of fixing railroad rates, I have failed to hear anyone inveigh against the English methods of governmental control, which are very similar to those proposed in the bill now before the House for the control of rate tariffs in this country. In fact, the great railroad systems of Great Britain have been conducted under a system of governmental control of freight and passenger rates for a number of years without harm to either the railroads or the great business and industrial interests of the country. The English railroads have made more money for their stockholders than the American railroads, and yet the complaint is not made that they are run in the interests of monopoly, and the public are guaranteed fair and just freight rates by the Government.

It is beyond dispute by anyone that the railroads in this country are public highways. The history of the organization of railroad companies demonstrates this and the unbroken line of court decisions sustains it. It is true they might have been organized as private corporations, but they were not. There is not a railroad company in the United States that has not accepted its charter on the basis that it intended to build and operate a public highway just in the same way that the old macadamized turnpike was built and operated as a public highway; and as a public highway the owners of railway securities can not deny the proposition that the people through their legislative bodies have a right to control and fix the tolls on these great public highways so long as the rate is not confiscatory.

Let me read to you what the Supreme Court of the United States has decided in the case of Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S. Reports, p. 467):

> A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the State. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the State. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is, therefore, under governmental control, subject, of course, to the constitutional guaranties for the protection of its property. It may not fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests and ignore the rights of the public; but the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad were exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public or of the services rendered, and in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders.
> In view of the adjudications these principles must be regarded as settled:
> 1. A railroad corporation is a person within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment, declaring that no State shall deprive any person of property without due process of law nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

2. A State enactment, or regulations made under the authority of a State enactment, establishing rates for the transportation of persons or property by railroad that will not admit of the carrier earning such compensation as, under all the circumstances, is just to it and to the public would deprive such carrier of its property without due process of law and deny to it the equal protection of the laws, and would therefore be repugnant to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

3. While rates for the transportation of persons and property within the limits of a State are primarily for its determination, the question whether they are so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the Constitution secures, and therefore without due process of law, can not be so conclusively determined by the legislature of the State, or by regulations adopted under its authority, that the matter may not become the subject of judicial inquiry.

This decision, one of many holding the same principles to be true, not only decides that a railroad is a public highway and subject to governmental control, but it also very clearly states the extent to which that control can effect the earning capacity of the property, and very clearly holds that railroads must be allowed to charge such rates for the transportation of persons and property as will enable them to meet all operating expenses, pay the interest on their obligations, and declare a dividend to their stockholders. What more can a fair and reasonable man ask? No law can be passed that can take away this right, as it is guaranteed by the Constitution. Then how can the wages of employees be affected by rates fixed by a railroad commission when the courts require that those rates must be sufficient to meet operating expenses? How can the owner or stockholder complain when the courts guarantee a dividend to the stockholder? No honest man who wants a fair and just rate for all shippers can be hurt and the dishonest man should be.

Let us, then, consider the question as to how we can best regulate these public highways, doing justice to the owners and for the good of the people. There are three ways in which it can be done. The Government can purchase all the railway systems in the United States and as the owner and operator fix absolutely the rates to be charged. That is one way. Another plan is for the Congress, either itself or by a commission appointed under the authority of its legislation, as an initial proposition to prescribe and define the rates or tolls to be charged for transportation of persons and property over these great railway highways. (In passing let me say in the beginning of railroad building in England the charters of all the original railway companies prescribed the maximum rates that could be charged.) The third system is to allow the railroad companies to fix their own rates and charges in the beginning and then provide a commission that shall have the power and authority to hear all complaints made by the public and determine what is a just and fair rate and then put it in operation and enforce it. That is what the bill now under consideration does—it only interferes in case of a contested rate. Mr. Chairman, as some of the gentlemen who have spoken seem to question this position, let me read from the bill itself:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged.

That being the language of the bill, how can any gentleman charge that Congress by this legislation proposes to initiate rate making? The words used are very clear and are not subject to misconstruction. When the railroads prescribe just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rates in the beginning no one will interfere, and it is only when they do not do so that the Commission will interfere and see that no injustice is done. How can any fair-minded man complain? Is it not fair and right to have a disinterested tribunal, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, given the power to determine in contested cases what is just between railroad and shipper, what is right between man and man, as the courts of the land have done for centuries past?

The very foundation stones of all civilized governments are the courts; life, property, and human liberty are dependent on them for preservation and protection. The Interstate Commerce Commission is merely a great court, vested with the power to see that the railroad highways of the country are kept open to all citizens alike on just and equal terms; that monopolistic greed shall not possess them as an instrument to oppress the poor, and that honest industry may freely use them to develop the great resources of our country.

This legislation does not attempt to make railroad rates, but it says to every citizen of the United States if you complain that the rates given you by the railroads for the transportation of your goods, wares, and merchandise are such as to drive you out of the markets you are entitled to reach on equal terms with your competitors, if you are not permitted to build up your business and develop your industry, then it says we have appointed a tribunal before whom you can take your case and justice will be done.

A railroad company is not given the right to make all the money it can as an ordinary private corporation has the right to do. If I am in the shoe business, I have a right to make all the profit I fairly and honestly can. That is not the case with a railroad company. Is there any man on the floor of the House, whether he is in favor of this proposition or against it, who will contend that the owner of an old-time turnpike who has the right to charge toll to each wagon that passes on the road would have the right to make the farmers bringing their produce to town pay exorbitant tolls? Not one. Is there a man here who will deny that the rates charged for driving along the turnpike should be only reasonable and just, and that the owner of the turnpike should have only a fair and reasonable return on his investment? Not one. The railroads stand exactly in that attitude toward the public. They are entitled to a fair and reasonable return on the capital invested. They are entitled to keep up the betterments of the road; they are entitled to pay running expenses, and there is no legislation Congress can pass that can take that right away from them, but they are not entitled to take more.

There is another phase of this question that I wish to call to the attention of the House before I conclude.

Last fall a number of gentlemen claiming to represent the railroad men of America called on the President of the United States and protested against the enactment of the legislation we now have under consideration, claiming that it would have a tendency to reduce the wages of railroad employees in this country. Since that time I have received a number of petitions from railroad employees in my district requesting me to vote against the bill on the ground that it would reduce their wages. These petitions are all in the same language, have the appearance of being all manufactured by the same hand and to come from a source other than that of the employees themselves. Let me read to you a part of one of these petitions:

Whereas of the total number of employees mentioned above, 56,041 were locomotive firemen, whose share of the wages paid amounted to $37,484,283; and

Whereas in this country, where the rate-making power is in the hands of the railroads, the average daily wage paid firemen in 1903 was $2.28, while in Belgium, with state railroads, it was but 72 cents, and in Great Britain, with government control of rates, only 91 cents, although our freight rates are the lowest in the world: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the Tombigbee Lodge, No. 426, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, consisting of 170 members, are opposed to the enactment of any legislation which will give to the Interstate Commerce Commission, or to any other body, the power to make the rates for the railroads of this country, thereby controlling their employees, and consequently their ability to pay fair wages to their employees.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year 1904 shows that there are 1,312,537 railroad employees in this country, whose annual wages amount to the sum of $775,321,415. We can not pass the petition of this great number of American citizens by without giving them a most careful consideration. I have studied the question from their standpoint as thoroughly as I could, and have come to the conclusion that railroad rate legislation will not affect them in any way. In the first place, as I have shown by the Supreme Court decision that I have already read, that any railroad rate made by a railroad commission that did not provide sufficient revenue to take care of the operating expenses of the railroad would be confiscatory and enjoined by the courts. No one will believe that a commission acting in the interest of the American people will attempt to reduce the present wage scale of American workmen.

I do not deny that the railway wages of employees in European countries are less than they are in this country, but I do deny that the Government ownership or control in any material way accounts for the low wages in England, Belgium, and other continental countries. I contend that railroad wages are low in Europe because all wages are low in every branch of industry, and that railroad wages in America are high because the American standard of work and wages is high throughout and because the American railroad employees have the strongest and best labor organization in the world. It is organization that has kept up wages in this country.

In bulletin No. 20 of the Department of Labor, on page 8, in discussing the question of wages of European railway employees, the Department says:

The length of the working day and the general conditions of railway employment are also disadvantageously affected by the comparative weakness of railway labor organizations. In several countries, such as Prussia or Belgium, it is not permitted to railway employees to participate in any labor union; in other countries, like Austria, the unions are small, unimportant, and too intimately associated with political parties to have much influence, while even in France the railway labor unions have but little real power. In England, the home of trade unionism, the difficulties in the way of labor organizations among railway men have until recently placed a bar in the way of the attainment of the wishes of the men. The wide dispersion of the men, the special character of much of their work, the great degree of differentiation among the employees, and the innumerable differences in rank render it difficult to establish a general, strong, and permanent organization. It is usually found that the higher classes of employees desire to hold themselves aloof from those less favored, this being especially the case with the locomotive staff. In England and in France these better paid employees usually remain outside of the regular union when they do not actually form another and an antagonistic organization.

The weakness of the continental railroad organizations is shown in this statement.

Let me here call your attention to another pertinent fact why our railroad men receive higher wages than are paid abroad. It is because they do more work and render a greater service than does the foreigner. In the United States in the year 1896 there were employed on an average 454 men for each hundred miles of railroad, or 4½ men per mile. In England in 1895, 465,112 men were employed on 21,174 miles of railroad, or 22 men per mile. In France in 1896, 251,971 persons were employed on 22,895 miles of road, or 11 men per mile. In Belgium in 1896, on the state railroads, 48,415 persons were employed on 5,359 miles of road, or 9 men per mile. In other words, the American railroad man, on an average, does twice as much effective work for his employer as does the employee in Belgium, two and a half times as much as in France, and nearly five times as much as in England. Is he not entitled to the higher wage scale? He earns it.

Now, let me show you that it is not only the railroad wages that are lower in Europe than America, but that all wages are much lower; that the wage scale is low on account of the general condition of the country and not because the railroads are owned or controlled by the government.

The petition that I read a few moments ago stated that in 1903 the wages of a fireman was $2.28 in the United States, 91 cents in Great Britain, and 72 cents in Belgium for each work day. Taking the American wage of $2.28 a day as 100, the daily wage in Great Britain would be 40 per cent, or four-tenths of the American wage, and in Belgium it would be 31 per cent, or less than a third of our wage in this country.

Now, let us compare the fireman's wage. The same comparison can be shown as to the engineer, conductor, and other employees with the general wage scale of Europe. I have compiled a table of the wages of thirteen different trades from the data given in Bulletin No. 54, pages 1023 to 1086, of Bureau of Labor, giving the wages per hour and the hours of work in 1903, which I will now read.

Comparison of American and European wages and hours of labor, 1903.

From this table you see that a carpenter receives nearly 36 cents per hour in America, only 20 cents in Great Britain, and 7 cents in Belgium, whereas the American carpenter works only forty-nine and one half hours a week, the Englishman fifty, and the Belgian nearly sixty-five. This great difference is clearly not due to railroad control but to general conditions and labor organizations. Through the whole list of skilled mechanics the same comparison runs in varying degrees.

But let me call your attention to another table comparing the same wages and hours of labor on the per cent basis, taking the American wage at 100 as the standard. I read from Bulletin No. 54 of Bureau of Labor, page 1125:

Taking, for example, the occupation of carpenters it is seen that with the average hourly wages for the United States in 1903 represented as 100, the average hourly wages for Great Britain were but 56.4 per cent of that figure, or a little more than half the average wages paid in the United States; the wages for Germany were but 36.2 per cent, or a little more than one-third of those paid in the United States; the wages for France were but 43 per cent, or considerably less than one-half those paid in the United States; and the wages for Belgium were but 19.8 per cent, or less than one-fifth those paid in the United States.

Let us state the case clearly. The English fireman received, in 1903, 40 per cent of the American scale, and the Belgian 31 per cent; the English carpenter 56 per cent, the Belgian 19 per cent; the English compositor 40 per cent, the Belgian 21 per cent; the English plumber 45 per cent, the Belgian 17 per cent; the English stone mason 45 per cent, the Belgian 18 per cent, and so on through the entire wage scale. Does it not demonstrate beyond a doubt that the low rate of wages paid railroad men on the Continent is due entirely to the general conditions of the labor market there and is not due at all to government control of railroads?

France is the one great European nation that has no form of governmental control of its railroad system, and yet I find from the statistics contained in Bulletin No. 20, of the Department of Labor, that the great bulk of French railroad wages are under 5.26 francs, or $1.015, per day, 80.54 per cent of the employees receiving less than that sum, while nearly four-fifths of American railroad wages are from $1 to $2 per day. In fact, the American railroad wage is about double the French railroad wage. There are nearly three times as many men employed on the French roads; there is no governmental control, and yet the difference in the wage scale.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the only question left in doubt about the matter is whether the persons who prepared the petition I have referred to did so to mislead the railroad employees themselves or to fool the Members of Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me make a brief review as to present labor conditions of railroad men as compared to railroad conditions.

Let me read you a table showing the daily wages of railroad employees in 1895 and in 1904, showing the percentage of increase:

Statement relating to average daily compensation of railway employees for the years ending June 30, 1904 and 1895.

Class.	1904.	1895.	Increase, 1904 over 1895.
			Amount.	Per cent.

Employees, account floating equipment	2.17	1.91	.26	13.61
All other employees and laborers	1.82	1.65	.17	10.30

You will observe that within the time named the salaries of the general officers have increased 28.86 per cent, while that of engineers 12.33 per cent, firemen 14.63 per cent, conductors 15.13 per cent, section foremen 4.71 per cent, and switch tenders, watchmen, etc., only 1.14 per cent.

I find that the gross earnings of the railroads of the United States from operation in 1905 were $1,075,371,662; in 1904, $1,975,174,091, a net increase of $899,802,629, or an increase in nine years of 83.68 per cent; that within that time the operating expenses increased from $725,720,415 in 1895 to $1,338,896,253 in 1904, an increase of $613,175,838, or 84.49 per cent; that the net earnings in 1895 were $349,651,047 and in 1904 were $636,277,838, an increase of $286,626,791, or 81.98 per cent; that the number of miles of road operated on June 30, 1895, was 177,746 miles, and in 1904 was 212,243 miles, an increase of 34,496 miles, or an increase of mileage of 19.41 per cent, which demonstrates that the increased receipts are due to increased business on the old roads mostly, and not to any great extent to increased mileage.

I also find that the number of cars in freight service in 1893 was 1,013,307, in 1904 was 1,692,194, an increase of 678,887, or 67 per cent; that the number of locomotives in freight service in 1893 was 18,599, and in 1904 was 27,029, an increase of 8,430, or 45.32 per cent; that the number of tons of freight carried in 1893 was 745,119,482 tons, and in 1904 was 1,309,890,165 tons, an increase of 564,779,683 tons, or 75.80 per cent; that the number of tons carried for each trainman employed in 1893 was 5,083 tons, in 1904 was 6,800 tons, an increase of 1,715 tons, or 33.73 per cent; that the average number of tons in a train in 1893 was 184 tons, in 1904 was 308, an increase of 124 tons, or 67.39 per cent. All of which clearly demonstrates that the earning capacity of the railroads does not regulate the wages of the employees, for in the last ten years the railroad earnings have increased about 82 per cent, the cost of handling freight has decreased, for the average train now carries 67 per cent more in a load than it did ten years ago, the work of the trainmen has increased, for the number of tons carried to each trainman employed has increased 33 per cent since 1893, and the average increase of wages to trainmen during this period of unexampled prosperity has been less than 15 per cent, not enough to cover the increased cost of living during that period.

I will now read from bulletin No. 59 of the Bureau of Labor, on page 18, a table showing the increase in the retail prices of food from 1890 to 1904 as compared with the general increase in the wage scale in the United States in the same period.

Relative employees, hours per week, wages per hour, weekly earnings per employee and of all employees, retail prices of food, and purchasing power of hourly wages and of weekly earnings per employee, measured by retail prices of food, 1890 to 1904.

This table shows that in 1904, as compared with the average for the ten years from 1890 to 1899, 25.7 per cent more persons were employed; hours of labor per week had been reduced 4.1 per cent; wages per hour had increased 17 per cent; weekly earnings per employee had increased 12.2 per cent; weekly earnings of all persons employed had increased 41 per cent; retail prices of food had increased 11.7 per cent; the wages of one hour would purchase 4.7 per cent more food, and the earnings of a week would purchase 0.4 per cent more food.

The wages per hour of the average workman in the United States since 1895 has increased about 19 per cent. The average of the increase in wages paid trainmen in that period has been less than 15 per cent. In 1895 the purchasing power in the retail price of food of the weekly wages of employees was 100.6 and in 1904 was 100.4, a decrease of 0.2 per cent; and as railroad wages have not increased in that period as much as general wages, it is demonstrated beyond cavil that railroad employees are not receiving as great a wage, measured in the purchasing power of their money to buy food, as they did ten years ago, and yet within that time the railroads have experienced an era of prosperity never before known in the world.

Now, what I contend is this—that the railroad employees, so far as their wages are concerned, will not be affected in any way by this legislation; that the wages of railroad employees in this country are maintained solely by their safe and conservative labor organizations; that the only real interest that railroad men have in the pending legislation is that of the general public in its opposition to present conditions, which allow the great monopolistic corporations of this country special privileges in the way of rebates, private car rental, switch-track pooling, and other devices, through which they receive the benefit of discriminating freights, whereby they are enabled to drive their competitors from the country's markets and absolutely control the prices the public must pay for many of the necessities of life.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of the Government interfering with the business of the country. I believe every man should be allowed freedom to work out his own destiny, but I do believe that the railroad highways of the country are as necessary to the life of commerce as the air we breathe is to the life of the human body. I believe the air should be free to all, and I believe the opportunities of commerce should be free to all. This can be only when every man has equal rights and equal opportunity to seek his markets along the public highways with every other man. That is not the case to-day. This bill seeks to abolish discrimination and injustice. It provides a fair tribunal to see that all men are given an equal chance, that only just and fair rates are charged. The bill is not all I want, but it goes in the right direction and I support it for that reason. It stands for fair play, it stands against monopoly, it stands for the right against the wrong, it stands for the people against the trusts. It means the dawning of a new day in our commercial prosperity, when industry and thrift may march unshackled to the marts of trade. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in this limited time it would be almost the height of folly for me to undertake to discuss the bill. I am going to read what I propose to offer as an amendment at the proper time, Mr. Chairman, as part of my remarks now.

Add a new section, as follows, after section 8:

SEC. 9. That section 22 of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Any officer or employee of any railroad included within the provisions of this act who shall make, issue, or give any free pass or passage ticket not in good faith intended to be paid for over such railroad, or any railroad connecting therewith, to any person not allowed or authorized to pass free, according to the provisions of this section; or who shall pass free, according to the provisions of this section; or who shall pass, or cause to pass, free over such railroad to any such person; and any person not so allowed or authorized to pass free who shall receive and use any such free pass or free passage ticket, or any evidence thereof, shall be punished by fine, not exceeding $1,000 for each offense, and it shall be the duty of the several courts having jurisdiction to charge regularly their grand juries to investigate violations of this section.

"No free passes, or evidence thereof, shall be issued by, or in behalf of, any railroad corporation, unless they are signed by some officer of said corporation authorized by vote of the directors to sign the same; and every railroad corporation shall keep a record, showing the date of every free pass, the name of the person to whom it is issued, the points between which the passage is granted, and whether a single trip or time pass, and, if the latter, the time for which it is issued; and this record shall, at all times, be opened to every stockholder in said corporation and to the Interstate Commission; and it shall be the duty of said Commission to cause prosecutions to be instituted on account of the issue of any free passes, or evidence thereof, contrary to law."

Mr. Chairman, I will insert section 22 of the commerce act of 1887 right here so that you can see the old law which I propose to amend:

SEC. 22. Free or reduced rates—Excursions—Mileage—Commutation rates—Remedies cumulative.—That nothing in this act shall prevent the carriage, storage, or handling of property free or at reduced rates for the United States, State, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes or to and from expositions for exhibition thereat or the free carriage of destitute and homeless persons transported by charitable societies, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion or to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons or to inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and of Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge under arrangements with the boards of managers of said Homes.

Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their own officers and employees, or to prevent the principal officers of any railroad company or companies from exchanging passes or tickets with other railroad companies for their officers and employees; and nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies: Provided, That no pending litigation shall in any way be affected by this act [as amended March 2, 1889]: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall prevent the issuance of joint interchangeable 5,000-mile tickets, with special privileges as to the amount of free baggage that may be carried under mileage tickets of 1,000 or more miles.

But before any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, shall issue any such joint interchangeable mileage tickets with special privileges, as aforesaid, it shall file with the Interstate Commerce Commission copies of the joint tariffs of rates, fares, or charges, on which such joint interchangeable mileage tickets are to be based, together with specifications of the amount of free baggage permitted to be carried under such tickets, in the same manner as common carriers are required to do with regard to other joint rates by section 6 of this act; and all the provisions of said section 6 relating to joint rates, fares, and charges shall be observed by said common carriers and enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as fully with regard to such joint interchangeable mileage tickets as with regard to other joint rates, fares, and charges referred to in said section 6. It shall be unlawful for any common carrier that has issued or authorized to be issued any such joint interchangeable mileage tickets to demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for transportation of persons or baggage under such joint interchangeable mileage tickets than that required by the rate, fare, or charge specified in the copies of the joint tariff of rates, fares, or charges filed with the Commission in force at the time. (Penalties.) The provisions of section 10 of this act shall apply to any violation of the requirements of this proviso. (Added by Laws 1895, chap. 61, approved Feb. 8, 1895.)

Mr. Chairman, this free transportation matter is a very serious one. There has been a great deal said on the subject with nothing recently done to prevent it. We can act now. There has been a great deal of ridicule about not using passes. There has been much sneering about it, but I say to this Congress, that we are doing ourselves an injustice in not prohibiting the issuance of passes to the officers of this Government or the use of them by any of the auxiliary employees of the Government of the United States. The public welfare demands immediate "antipass" legislation.

I think I have the official document before me clearly showing—although I do not make it as a charge—where officers of the Government have been issued passes, and I presume used them and kept their mileage; the Government always pays them when conducting public business.

Such an act is cold-blooded "graft," to say the least, whether so intended or not.

This amendment prohibits and makes unlawful the issuance and use of anything that is a free pass, in words or in effect, and punishes those who commit such acts, but this amendment does not repeal the exemption set out in section 22 of the act of 1887.

I am the friend of railroads. They are a public necessity. I bear no ill feeling toward them; certainly none against those which obey the law. But I am the uncompromising enemy of the wrongs they do, have done, and can hereafter do, not only to each other, but to the people who created them to serve them as public carriers at a reasonable and just toll. And in addressing myself to this free-pass abuse, I feel that I am doing not only the railroads but the people a great public service, as well as doing my duty as their servant.

I have on my desk the fourth volume of the report of the Industrial Commission, which investigated this subject, having heard a number of witnesses on the free-pass evil, and I think without a single exception they condemned the free-pass system and wanted a national law to stop it, applying alike to all railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

I remember one of the statements of Mr. Paul Morton, late Secretary of the Navy, who said that at a great railroad meeting it was agreed to stop, as far as possible, the issuance of these passes, and a resolution was passed calling for an expression from the various railroad heads of the United States representing over 150,000 out of about 180,000. They replied that they wanted this free-pass evil stopped, or at least reduced to proper grounds.

I will read what Mr. Morton and others said.

Mr. Paul Morton, vice-president of the Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad, November 22, 1899, before the Industrial Commission, said:

Passes are given for many reasons, almost all of which are bad ones. There should be no passes printed. Even railroad officials or employees traveling on other lines than those they work for should be required to pay fare. The chief reason that stimulates a man to ask a railroad company for a free pass is that somebody else has it. Passes are given for personal, political, and commercial reasons, and in exchange for advertising; for services and for various other reasons. I am in favor of the total abolition of railroad passes, and this view is held by a large number of the railroads of the country, as will be seen by the extract, quoted below, from the proceedings of a meeting of executive officers of western, northwestern, and southwestern railroads, held in October last in St. Louis:

"Recommended:

"First. That all free or reduced transportation of every description both State and interstate, with the exception of that to railroad employees, be discontinued.

"Second. That reduced or free transportation to railroad employees be very much restricted.

"Third. That a joint meeting of all the leading American lines be called for the purpose of considering this subject, with the end in view of entirely stopping the pass abuse.

"Fourth. That a copy of these recommendations be submitted to all lines, with the request that they each go on record as to their views, and, if they favor discontinuing the practice of issuing free transportation, state how many railroads they believe should subscribe to the movement in order to make it effective."

The foregoing recommendations were submitted to the executive officers of 205 railroads, representing a mileage of 184,000 miles—practically all of the mileage of the country.

Replies in favor of radical action in either abolishing or restricting the issuance of free transportation have been received from 129 of the railroads thus addressed, representing 150,590 miles.

While this indicates that a large proportion of the railroads want to shut off the free-pass abuse, I doubt if anything ever comes of it until Congress passes a law prohibiting it.

There should be no unjust discriminations in rates of freight or fares in favor of individuals or localities.

Transportation is a public service, and the charges are in the nature of a tax. They should be absolutely fair to all. Almost any kind of legislation that will insure this will be wise.

One great difficulty that the railroads have to contend with is the adjustment of relative rates from competing distributing points. Much money has been wasted in contending for differential rates in favor of this place or that, and there ought to be some tribunal—such as the Interstate Commerce Commission—empowered to settle such disputes. Many of the rate wars of the western country have been caused by such contentions, and the result has generally been a restoration of old conditions, an arbitration, or a slight concession of some kind or another.

Col. John H. Reagan said:

3. The allowance of free passes by the railroad companies is not done as a matter of charity, for they are not, as a rule, given to the poor and needy, but for the most part to public officials and to influential persons. It is one method of unjustly discriminating in freight rates in a way that it is difficult, if not impossible, to prevent, by furnishing free passes to shippers, their families, their agents, etc. And as the revenues of the roads must be kept up, it is the taxing of one part of the people for the benefit of another part of them which violates the commonest rules of right, and it is undoubtedly employed as one of the means of influencing public officials and members of legislative bodies in the performance of their official duties. It is unfair, unjust, and demoralizing, and should be prohibited by Congress and the several legislatures in their respective spheres of authority.

Mr. A. B. Stickney, president of the Chicago Great Western Railroad, in part said:

That is the way with this pass business. If it never had been or if there was some way to get rid of it without raising too much of a disturbance, I should think it was a good thing to get rid of, and I don't know but it is anyway.

Q. As a railroad man, taking your side of it, should you prefer to be rid of it?—A. Oh, Lord, yes; it is like Congressman patronage, which I should think every Congresman would be glad to get rid of.

* * * * * * *

Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) Do the members of the judiciary of Minnesota and Illinois hold passes over your road?—A. I don't think they do; I am not certain about that. If any of them ask for transportation, they get it; we don't hesitate to give to men of that class if they ask for passes; we never feel at liberty to refuse.

Q. (By Mr. KENNEDY.) You say that if members of the judiciary ask for a pass they will get it. Is there any reason why a judge of a court who gets a good salary should get a pass—that is to say, is there any greater reason than why John Smith should have a pass?—A. That depends upon what you would call a good reason.

Q. Is there any reason that would not avail so far as the general public is concerned?—A. Twenty-five years ago I had charge of a little bit of a road that was a sort of a subordinate of a larger road. I had occasion to visit the president of the superior road about something, and he said: "Mr. Stickney, I see that the sheriff of this county has a pass over your road. I should like to know on what principle you gave that sheriff a pass?" I said, "I did it on the principle that he was a power, and I was afraid to refuse him." "Well," he said, "I refused him." I said, "You will wish you hadn't before the year is over." Some time afterwards, and during the year, I went into the office to see the superintendent, but he was not in; I went into the general freight agent's office, and he was not in; I went into the general manager's office, and he was not in. So I then went into the office of the president and said, "What kind of a road have you got? Your superintendent is not here, your general freight agent is not here, and your general manager is not here." He hung his head down and said: "Do you remember that conversation we had about that sheriff's pass? He has got all these men on the jury and has got them stuck for about two weeks."

Q. That answer seems to indicate that railroads would be afraid to refuse for fear of the penalties?—A. I think the railroads find there is a class of men that it is to their interest not to refuse if they ask for passes.

Q. Is it not bad in morals that a judge of a court should get a pass in that way and that a private citizen could not get one?—A. I would rather not assume to be a judge of morals; let other men judge of that for themselves.

Q. Still, you say you would like to be rid of the pass system?—A. Yes.

Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) Would you like to have Congress prohibit the granting of passes for interstate traffic?—A. That might help things and it might not. Legislation on such things works an advantage sometimes, and sometimes it does not altogether.

Q. It seems to me that it would be useless to have such laws if you could not enforce them and punish the man who gives passes or the man who receives them.—A. Well, I don't know. I notice in England and on the Continent that they have a great many laws regulating these things, and you will see signs posted stating that such and such things are forbidden under penalty of 10 shillings or 20 shillings, and I notice they enforce these laws. Now, let Congress pass a law forbidding passes and impose a penalty of $5 or $15, or some sum like that, and there should be some possibility of enforcing it; but impose a penalty of five years' imprisonment or $5,000, and I don't think you are going to get the American people to enforce any such penalties.

Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, president of the Illinois Central, says:

Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) Is not the granting of passes an illegal discrimination when you carry a man across the boundary of a State?—A. I would rather you would prove it by some other witness, gentlemen, to put it in all candor. [Laughter.]

Q. (By Senator MALLORY.) Do you regard it as an evil?—A. Yes. I am so constituted I do not believe in giving something for nothing under any circumstances. I think the evil of the pass situation is, seriously, this: It is the only way of getting value out of the treasury of the railroad company without leaving a voucher. There is no other way known to me.

Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) Do not the railroad companies give these passes for value to be received?—A. Some of them, but the particular value received is not of record.

Q. It is not of record, but is it not in the form of favors of various kinds?—A. I am giving passes now to persons that are serving the company well, and they are entitled to it. I can defend hundreds of passes. There are reasons; but the same thing would enable me to go right to the treasury of the company and put in a voucher and give these men, say, $100, just exactly the same. If it is defensible for value received, it can be paid by money.

Q. (By Senator MALLORY.) What do you say about these passes given to members of the legislature and Members of Congress and Senators?—A. I think the whole thing should be stopped.

Q. Do you think there is value received in this case?—A. I have been told there is at times.

Mr. Samuel Spencer, president of the Southern Railroad, said:

Q. Do you not think that the generally recognized violation of any law has a bad moral effect on the community in which that violation is practiced?—A. I think so, undoubtedly. It weakens the moral force of the community at large.

Q. That being so, can you state to the commission to what extent the free-pass system, or free transportation system, is practiced? I will not ask in reference to your railroad, but railroads in general in this country.—A. I will be very glad to have you specify.

Q. Well, your railroad.—A. The policy of the Southern is that its whole business shall be public to one and all. I have no objection to answering generally or specifically if you want it. The pass system has grown to be an abuse throughout the entire country, and it is an abuse on the Southern just as well as it is on other roads, but I hope not to the same extent; but it is an abuse, and one which at the moment we can not throw off.

Q. It is just as much prohibited or more prohibited than the ticket-brokerage system?—A. No. The language of the interstate-commerce law upon that subject is such that the prohibition of passes is covered by a general clause. There is no specific law in regard to the free-transportation system only in the question of discrimination.

Q. It is included in that?—A. It is included in that, undoubtedly. But you can not put your finger on it with quite the same specificness as you can the other provision.

Q. You say it is generally abused. You mean by that that passes are given without consideration?—A. Without really a proper consideration, yes.

Q. Legitimate consideration?—A. Yes.

Q. And you think it is a general abuse?—A. I do. I think it is widespread all over this country.

Q. Do you not think it would be well, if it is feasible, to have legislation enacted that will prevent it?—A. I would like to see a statute passed that there should not be one issued to anyone.

Prof. E. R. Johnson, president of the University of Pennsylvania, said:

Q. (By Mr. KENNEDY.) Have you anything to say about the practice of giving passes, State laws prohibiting them, etc.?—A. I think it is something that ought to be prohibited by law. I think passes ought without exception to be restricted to actual employees of the railway corporations, and there is no doubt in my mind that the influences of the pass system upon our legislatures and judiciary are altogether bad.

Commissioner Knapp said:

It would be impossible to say to what extent that results in diminished revenue to the carrier. I have heard it claimed—I know nothing about it, and make the statement only on that information—that probably the actual revenues received by all the railroads of the country from their passenger business did not exceed 75 or 80 per cent of what they would be at the published rates multiplied by the journeys actually taken.

Q. If it would be possible to abolish this pass system, which is just as bad a discrimination as the freight, in fact worse, what effect do you think it would have on the cash fare—would it lower the rates of a paying passenger or would not the railroads charge the same, taking the usufruct of the whole for themselves?—A. What would result I can not say.

Q. What would be your opinion, in your Interstate Commerce Commission, about a question of that kind?—A. I should feel warranted in answering your question this way: If we could eliminate the free transportation and bring this public service down to the impartial conditions where every person who uses it pays his proper share, I believe the passenger rates throughout the country could be materially reduced and still the railroads have better returns from that branch of their service than they have at the present time.

Q. Is it possible to amend the interstate-commerce bill to abolish passes?—A. I think so, surely, and a good many other things that now occur.

Q. (By Mr. RATCHFORD.) Is it not a fact that professional men and ministers of the gospel usually are provided with passes?—A. I am not aware that professional men as a class ordinarily receive any concessions, but clergymen as a rule get half rates.

Q. (By Mr. KENNEDY.) Does the practice extend to Federal and State judiciary and district attorneys?—A. I do not know. I think the practice is diverse. My opinion is that in many sections of the country the judiciary, both Federal and State, have free transportation. In some cases it is not accepted. In some States it is prohibited; in others it is in a way recognized as one of the perquisites and emoluments of the office.

Q. (By Professor JOHNSON.) It was testified before your commission by an officer of the Louisville and Nashville that his railroad gave passes to judicial officers.—A. Yes; but there is no such general practice, I mean to say, as corresponds with the arrangement in which clergymen get half rates. That is quite universal.

Mr. Chairman, in a number of the reports made by the Cooley Commission, and also when Mr. Morrison was chairman, the subject of free passes was discussed and condemned as an unwise and immoral practice, detrimental to the public interests and destructive of the revenues of the railroad.

In one of the reports of the Cooley Commission that tribunal states that by its enforcement the revenues of the railroads had been saved, with a corresponding reduction of the cost of railroad transportation, and particularly out West. In speaking of the enforcement of the commerce act of 1887 (vol. 1, p. 322), the Cooley Commission says:

In some particulars, as we understand has also been the case with similar statutes in some of the States, it has operated directly to increase railroad earnings, especially in the cutting off of free passes on interstate passenger traffic and in putting an end to rebates, drawbacks, and special rates upon freight business.

The results of the law in these respects are all so eminently satisfactory to the general public, certainly to all who had not been wont to profit by special or personal advantages.

In connection with the abolition of the pass system, there has been some reduction in passenger fares, especially in the charge made for mileage tickets in the Northwest, the section of the country where they are perhaps most employed.

On pages 265 and 266 the Commission, in very vigorous and severe terms, describes "the pass system" and condemns it in no unmistakable terms. In concluding its comment, the Commission says:

Much suspicion of public men resulted, which was sometimes just, but also sometimes unjust and cruel; and some deterioration of the moral sense of the community, traceable to this cause, was unavoidable while the abuse continued. The parties most frequently and most largely favored were those possessing large means and having large business interests.

The demand for free transportation was often in the nature of blackmail, and was yielded to unwillingly and through fear of damaging consequences from a refusal. But the evils were present as much when it was extorted as when it was freely given.

Mr. Chairman, it not only caused people who use passes to be suspected—people, I mean, who do wrong, who give or take them for evil purposes—but it is worse than that.

Mr. Chairman, here is what I mean and want to impress upon this honorable body. There are men who use free passes—indeed, so far as that is concerned, we know that some of our women, and, I may add, some of our sweethearts, use passes. God bless them! Of course the women can do no wrong. But I am talking about the man who is a public officer and who uses a pass, and yet does right in his official deportment, if there is such a man. He is criticised, nevertheless; he is suspected, nevertheless; and the full measure of that man's influence is lessened. That is a distressing pity. He should quit the practice.

Another thing. Unquestionably—and the Cullom report which I have here on my desk states it—the promiscuous issuance of free passes has caused a "privileged class" to rise up in this country to the detriment of the public welfare and has caused the price of tickets to be higher than it otherwise would be. The Cullom report says:

> That a privileged class is created by the granting of passes, and that the cost of the passenger service is largely increased by the extent of this abuse.

This is found in the Commerce Report of 1886, at page 181.

I read an article in the American Law Review not long ago from the pen of Judge Clark, of the supreme court of North Carolina, a very distinguished man, and he said that by reason of the issuance of free passes in that State the people of North Carolina were required to pay on an average about 3½ cents a mile for travel.

In that State in 1897 there was a prosecution against the Southern Railroad and another railroad for issuing and honoring an "annual pass" to a member of the legislature. And our colleague from that State [Mr. POU] caused that railroad to be indicted. I am glad that he has shown himself to be an upright, law-abiding citizen even when he is at home. He has raised a high standard here in the House, we note with pleasure. He is not without honor at home or abroad. Mr. Chairman, the railroad was convicted and fined, and in that case—reported in 122 North Carolina Reports—I find this remarkable statement in the opinion, delivered by Justice Douglas, the son of Stephen A. Douglas:

> It is currently reported that a hundred thousand passes were issued in the State of North Carolina within the year 1897. Of our three leading railroad systems, one reported over 15,000 passes issued, while another reported 30,000. The defendant herein, the largest system of all, and having a direct pecuniary interest of vital importance before the legislature refused to make any report, relying upon its legal exemption from compulsory self-incrimination.
> Taking the estimate of 100,000 passes as correct, as it is 397 miles from Raleigh to Murphy, on the west, and still farther to Elizabeth City, on the east, it is fair to assume that each pass would represent at least 100 miles of travel, equal to $3.25 in fare.
> This would represent the equivalent of $325,000 a year given to somebody, but to whom we do not know and for what purpose we need not inquire. These figures may not be correct, but they are the best obtainable under the circumstances.
> It is needless to suppose that transportation of such great pecuniary value would be given without some return, either present or prospective, and in any aspect its continuance would be unjust to the public interest and dangerous to the public welfare.
> Free transportation to so large an amount would necessarily place an additional burden upon the traveling public to make up the deficiency, while its irresponsible distribution would be a serious menace to public morality. So far, I fully concur in the opinion of the court.

Judge Douglas agreed with the majority of the court as to the construction given the law, but wrote a personal opinion, stating that he did not agree to affirming the judgment of the lower court, because the railroad stated that it did not intend to violate the law, and had been advised by high authority that in issuing this annual pass, and other passes, it was not violating the law. The facts were undisputed. Judge Douglas dissented because the intent was absent.

In 1897 the railroad mileage in the State of North Carolina was less than 2 per cent of the total mileage of the United States. On this small proportion we find it "currently reported," says Judge Douglas, that "100,000 passes were issued in North Carolina" in 1897, while on two of the roads actual official reports were made of 40,000 passes having been issued, while one railroad, the defendant, the largest, refused to report.

Some of these passes were for trips, I presume, and some were annuals, as the record shows. How many passes do you suppose were issued in 1897 on all the railroads in the United States? How much revenue was lost to the railroads, and how much more money did the people spend for passage as a result of these passes than in good morals they should have been taxed with?

Reading closely the statements before the industrial commission and the Cullom report of 1886 and the opinion of Judge Douglas, are you not surprised the people have stood this free-pass abuse as long as they have? Let Congress come to the rescue of the railroad and the people. The railroads say one railroad can't stop this abuse. Let us help them by passing a national law to reach the evil, and make it easy of enforcement and demand its enforcement and by our example help to enforce it.

Now, there are certain exemptions under section 22. The law does not go far enough, and it is hard to enforce. I have also here, Mr. Chairman, that which will show to you the lack of strength and application in the law.

Here is a case where the Boston Railroad was found guilty by the Interstate Commerce Commission, presided over by Mr. Morrison, for issuing passes, and it is made Senate Document 63, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session. Here are some twenty-eight pages giving a list of the passes issued by that railroad, as shown by exhibits to its answer. The answer classifies them as follows:

> Class 1 includes sick, necessitous, or indigent persons; in short, all cases of charity strictly.
> Class 2 includes gentlemen like Hon. James W. Bradbury, long eminent in the public service.
> Class 3 includes proprietors of summer hotels and large boarding houses, conformably to a practice which has long existed among all the railroads of New England.
> Class 4 includes wives of employees and other immediate members of employees' families.
> Class 5 includes all agents of ice companies and all milk contractors doing business on the line of the Boston and Maine Railroad, or any part thereof extending between any two States, said agents and contractors traveling on the trains in the conduct of their business.
> Class 6 includes the higher officers of State in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts, and certain prominent officers of the United States, like the collector of customs.
> Class 7 includes the railroad commissioners of each of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts.
> Class 8 includes the members of the railroad committee for the time being of the legislature of each of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts.
> Class 9 includes persons who are trustees under mortgages on the property of the corporation and who are entitled to inspect its property by virtue of the deed or indenture constituting them trustees.
> Class 10 (in the schedules annexed called "Complimentary") includes persons whose good will is important to the corporation and who, so long as the general practice of railroads remains what it now is, might justly take offense if in the matter of free transportation they were to receive from the Boston and Maine Railroad different treatment from that received from other railroad corporations.
> Ninth. The Boston and Maine Railroad respectfully submits that the foregoing is a full and complete answer and disclosure in respect of all the matters and things inquired of by the Commission in its order of July 14, 1891, and prays that it may be discharged from any further answer or duty in the premises.

> BOSTON AND MAINE RAILROAD,
> By JAS. T. FURBER, Vice-President.

This railroad was arraigned by the Commission for issuing passes in Federal commerce. These passes, as shown by these exhibits, were all interstate passes. Mr. Richard Olney defended the railroad and Senator Chandler prosecuted. The whole record of the case, including arguments and the opinion of Mr. Morrison, are found in this document. According to the decision in this case, the railroad was found guilty of an illegal discrimination by issuing passes to some and making others pay for the same kind of service—that is, the Commission held that this was an illegal discrimination, and ordered this railroad to cease and desist in so doing. This order was served on every other railroad engaged in Federal commerce in the United States, as this document shows. But the railroads, we know, continue to disobey the law. Here is evidence from the supreme court of North Carolina, and here it is in this Boston case. The railroads pay no attention to this law. It needs this amendment.

Now, gentlemen, here is an opportunity to strengthen this law, and if this provision does not go far enough, then somebody write a better one and pass that.

The railroads want this law. In my own State one member of the legislature got 1,700 passes, common repute said, and went down in Nashville and sold them and put the money in his pocket. He was a citizen who had been a great man in public life, who had been a Member of Congress, I may add. Here is the language of the railroad officials themselves in the testimony before the Industrial Commission, which states in effect that they are afraid not to issue passes. The Cooley Commission said it was a species of blackmail.

I remember something like this in my State: One head of a great convention came down and got about 1,500 passes, and the leader of the other division came to the railroads and said: "You have given that division so many passes, now you have got to give my division the same number." And the railroad company was just blackmailed into issuing the passes.

A leading railroad man in Tennessee, who is well known to my colleague [Mr. HOUSTON], who listens to me to-day, said to an intimate railroad friend of mine that if everybody would pay their passage over his road, "I could pay my taxes and not have any trouble with tax suits with the State of Tennessee," as now and then he does have. In other words, laying aside the immorality of it, in free-pass uses, laying aside its insidious and evil influence, it takes the railroad's legitimate revenue from it, and the railroad, to make up for that loss, makes the man who buys the ticket pay for the ticket and also for the pass used. That is the effect of it.

Now, the average receipts for hauling passengers, according to the official reports, is a little less than 2 cents a mile. I have paid as high as 5 cents this last year for railroad travel. I have paid 3½ cents and also as low as 3 cents on the same day, for I kept tab when I was riding a distance of about 150 miles. What becomes, then, of the difference between a little less than 2 cents and 3 and 3½ cents and 5 cents? It goes to liquidate the free passage and transportation of these people who ride upon passes.

That is wrong; the common carrier knows it and he is an unwilling party to it. It makes the poorer class of society, Mr. Chairman, pay its way. I remember I was going through a little town near my home, about 40 miles distant, and an old farmer got on the train. I didn't know him. He had chickens on one arm and a bucket of eggs on the other. He pulled out his ticket, gave it to the conductor when he came along; but three distinguished friends and neighbors of mine, all men of means, who got on the train with the old farmer, when the conductor came to them all pulled out passes.

Now, gentlemen, that is enough to make that old man who was struggling to get to town, possibly to get clothes for his wife and children, perhaps to buy medicine—it is enough to make him hate the railroads; it is enough to make him hate the law that we do not enforce and hate us. It breeds bad feeling—one of resentment.

I say, as a matter of friendship to the railroads, that we should remove this incubus. We should take away from it this species of blackmail; we should take it away from the railroads so that they can not appeal to our sense of gratitude when we ride on passes—a thing I do not do, I may add by way of parenthesis, and I do not intend to. I would walk my legs off up to my knees before I would do it. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I am talking on the railroad side of this proposition. I am going to vote for the bill. There ought to be some changes made in it, and if I had the making of it I would make at least a plainer written bill, and probably every other Member in the House may think he can do the same thing.

Mr. Chairman, I expect my time is nearly up, but I want to say that there are no politics in this effort of mine. I know that the railroads want this provision of law. You see that it ought to be passed. The law as it is is worthless, for the Commission can not enforce it. They have tried to do it; they want the railroads to cease issuing passes, and here is the opinion where it was ordered and refused. The morals of the whole country are suffering from this free-pass ulcer. Cure it now. The public morals of the country are trenched upon as well as the revenues of the railroads, which the roads are justly entitled to have. [Applause.]

Opinion in part of Commissioner Morrison in the Boston Railroad case, and the orders, etc., issued therein:

In the third report to Congress, in 1890, the Commission said, in the course of a long discussion of the subject, as follows:

"The statute undoubtedly was framed to prohibit passes or free transportation of persons, as one of the forms of unjust discrimination, favoritism, and misuse of corporate powers that had grown into an abuse of large proportions, and become demoralizing in its influence and detrimental to railroads, both in loss of revenue and in provoking public hostility. * * * The law aims at the correction of the abuses of free transportation, and, in accomplishing this general purpose, some forms of free or reduced transportation that at first view might appear plausible, or even unobjectionable in themselves, have to fall under its general restrictions. * * * The discrimination is equally unjust whether the free transportation be complimentary or to aid some person's business, or for some supposed indirect advantage to the carrier. The correction of the evil, and the equality of right to which all are entitled, required the restrictions to be general and sweeping to furnish any substantial assurance that the abuse should not be continued or new ones devised under cover of any discretion left to the carrier."

And again, after referring to section 22 of the act, the report further says:

"The classes of persons that may have reduced rates or free carriage are thus carefully specified in the statute, and their enumeration necessarily excludes all others. Except as qualified by this section, the issuance and sale of passenger tickets must be in accordance with the general principles of the act."

Other utterances and decisions of the Commission to the same legal effect have been made every year since its organization, and its construction of the act has been indicated by its repeated recommendations to Congress to add other classes of persons to the exceptions (as they were always regarded by the Commission) contained in section 22

We find not only these views held by the Commission from its organization, but by the Federal courts when the question has arisen.

In Ex parte Koehler, 1 Interstate Commerce Report, 317, Judge Deady decided, on the application of the receiver of the Oregon and California Railway Company, asking for instruction as to the granting of free transportation to the families of employees, that the act to regulate commerce prohibited the issuance of passes to such persons, they not being included in what he held to be the excepted classes named in section 22.

Without further citation of authority, the construction we give to section 2 of the act to regulate commerce is that where the service by the carrier subject to the act is "like and contemporaneous" for different passengers, the charge to one of a greater or less compensation than to another constitutes unjust discrimination, and is unlawful, unless the charge of such greater or less compensation is allowed under the exceptions provided in section 22; and that where the traffic is "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" in other respects, it is not rendered dissimilar within the meaning of the statute by the fact that such passengers hold unlike or, as sometimes termed, unequal official, social, or business positions, or belong to different classes as they ordinarily exist in a community, or are arbitrarily created by the carrier.

Under this construction of the act the practice of the defendant in giving free transportation, such as it concedes was issued to "gentlemen long eminent in the public service," "higher officers of States, and prominent officials of the United States," "members of legislative railroad committees," "persons whose good will is important to the corporation," is unwarranted unless the favored person also comes under some exception specified in section 22 of the act to regulate commerce.

The investigation was instituted, as appears from the original order, for the purpose more especially of making inquiry into the business practice of issuing free passes by the defendant than with reference to any particular case or special infraction of the law.

The inquiry developed, however, that, in addition to the classes of persons last above stated, the defendant has issued other so-called free passes, which were free in name only, for in reality there was some consideration therefor passing from the recipient to the defendant, such as those issued to newspaper proprietors, editors, and reporters in exchange for advertising, to hotel proprietors, to ice dealers and milk dealers, and to some other persons who are claimed to stand on special ground of right.

As to these latter classes of persons, the investigation has thus far brought out some of the facts, but would have to be extended to enable us to pass a satisfactory judgment upon them. To avoid the delay which a proper and full investigation of these classes would occasion, and in view of their minor importance, and yet perhaps greater difficulty of decision, and of the urgency that the defendant should be informed before the close of the present calendar year of our decision, so far as we are able to render it at the present time, we have concluded to hold the case as to the passes issued to the last-mentioned classes for such further investigation as may be necessary to put us in full possession of all the facts before finally passing upon them, and in the meantime to issue an order applicable to the classes first mentioned, in accordance with the construction of the law as above set forth, this being pursuant to practice in other cases.

At a general session of the Interstate Commerce Commission, held at its office in Washington, D. C., on the 29th day of December, A. D. 1891. In the matter of the carriage of persons free or at reduced rates by the Boston and Maine Railroad Company.

Present: Hon. William R. Morrison, Hon. Wheelock G. Veazey, Hon. Martin A. Knapp, Commissioners.

This proceeding having been instituted by an order of the Commission entered on the 16th day of July, 1891, and due hearing and investigation having been had, the Commission did, on the date hereof, to wit, the 29th day of December, 1891, make and file a report and opinion containing its finding of fact and conclusions thereon, which said report and opinion is hereby referred to and made a part of this order; and the Commission having, as appears by said report and opinion, found and decided, among other things, that the defendant, the Boston and Maine Railroad Company, has violated the provisions of the act to regulate commerce by issuing and giving to divers persons described in said report and opinion tickets called and known as "passes," which entitled said persons to be carried as passengers over its line of railroad between points in different States without any charge therefor, and by furnishing such free transportation to said persons on presentation of such passes, while at the same time defendant held in effect over its said line for the transportation of passengers between the same points certain rates of charge, commonly called "fares," and charged and received the same as compensation from other persons for service rendered in transporting them as passengers between said points in different States, which said service was like unto and contemporaneous with the service rendered by it without compensation in the transportation under substantially similar circumstances and conditions of a like kind of traffic, to wit, the carriage of such first-named persons over its said line as passengers between the same points. And it is also found that further investigation and consideration should be had in regard to the issuing of passes and the furnishing of transportation free or at reduced rates by defendant to other classes of persons, also described in said report and opinion of the Commission herein.

It is ordered and adjudged, That the defendant, the Boston and Maine Railroad Company, do wholly and immediately cease and desist from charging, demanding, collecting, or receiving from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers between points in different States than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of passengers under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, by issuing without charge to persons not included within the classes of persons described in the twenty-second section of the act to regulate commerce tickets or passes entitling them to transportation as passengers over its line of railroad between points in different States, or by transporting such persons, or others not included in the aforesaid classes described in said twenty-second section, over its line of railroad as passengers between points in different States without the payment by them of any rate, charge, or fare, or upon the payment of a reduced rate, charge, or fare; and in carrying out the provisions of this order said defendant is further hereby directed and required to be governed by the requirements and construction of law laid down in the report and opinion of the Commission herein.

Be it further ordered, That this matter be retained for further investigation and consideration of such questions involved therein as have not been determined by the Commission in said report and opinion.

And it is further ordered, That copies of the report and opinion of the Commission herein and of this order be sent forthwith to all common carriers subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce as notice of the requirements and construction of law laid down in said report and opinion in regard to the transportation of passengers, that they may govern themselves accordingly.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

I, Edward A. Moseley, secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, do hereby certify that the foregoing copies of report and opinion of the Commission and order of the Commission in the proceeding entitled "In the matter of the carriage of persons free or at reduced rates by the Boston and Maine Railroad Company" are true copies of the originals now on file and recorded in the office of this Commission.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the seal of the Commission this 16th day of January, 1892.

[SEAL.] EDW. A. MOSELEY, Secretary.

On October 17, 1898, the following petition was filed by Charles A. Busiel, which, with the accompanying papers, are also submitted in response to the direction of the Senate, since they refer to the same subject:

Before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the matter of the carriage of persons free or at reduced rates by the Boston and Maine Railroad Company.

Now comes Charles A. Busiel, as petitioner in this proceeding, and respectfully shows:

I. That the petitioner is a resident of Laconia, in the State of New Hampshire, and brings this petition in his own behalf and also in the interest of the people of the State of New Hampshire and all passengers over the lines operated by the above-named railroad company.

II. That in this proceeding, instituted by an order of this Commission on the 16th day of July, 1891, this Commission did, after due hearing and investigation, to wit, on the 29th day of December, 1891, make and file a report and opinion containing its findings of fact and conclusions in said proceeding, and did also on said last-mentioned date issue an order directed to said Boston and Maine Railroad Company, the respondent in said proceeding, notifying and requiring it, the said Boston and Maine Railroad Company, to "wholly and immediately cease and desist from charging, demanding, collecting, or receiving from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers between points in different States than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of passengers under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, by issuing without charge to persons not included within the classes of persons described in the twenty-second section of the act to regulate commerce tickets or passes entitling them to transportation as passengers over its line of railroad between points in different States, or by transporting such persons, or others not included in the aforesaid classes described in said twenty-second section, over its line of railroad as passengers between points in different States without the payment by them of any rate, charge, or fare, or upon the payment of a reduced rate, charge, or fare;" and in carrying out the provisions of said order the said respondent railroad company was further therein directed and required to be governed by the requirements and construction of law laid down in said report and opinion of the Commission. And it was further provided in and by said order that such questions involved in this proceeding as had not been determined by the Commission in said report and opinion should be retained for further investigation and consideration, which said questions are stated in said report and opinion of the Commission as follows, to wit:

"The investigation was instituted, as appears from the original order, for the purpose more especially of making inquiry into the business practice of issuing free passes by the defendant than with reference to any particular case or special infraction of the law. The inquiry developed, however, that in addition to the classes of persons last above stated, the defendant has issued other so-called "free passes," which were free in name only, for in reality there was some consideration therefor passing from the recipient to the defendant, such as those issued to newspaper proprietors, editors, and reporters, in exchange for advertising, to hotel proprietors, to ice dealers and milk dealers, and to some other persons who are claimed to stand on special ground of right. As to these latter classes of persons the investigation has thus far brought out some of the facts, but would have to be extended to enable us to pass a satisfactory judgment upon them."

III. That said respondent, whatever it may have done immediately subsequent to the date of said order in compliance with the provisions thereof, did thereafter and does now fail and neglect to obey the requirements thereof; that is to say, the said respondent has been, since the date of said order, and is now, giving and affording free interstate transportation to persons not included within the classes of persons described in section 22 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, while it has been and is charging, demanding, collecting, and receiving compensation from other persons for like and contemporaneous service rendered by it under substantially similar circumstances and conditions.

IV. That said respondent has, since the date of said order, provided, and is now providing, transportation free or at reduced rates, or in lieu of compensation for real or pretended services to newspaper proprietors, editors, and reporters, hotel proprietors, ice dealers, milk dealers, freight shippers, and others engaged in various trades and professions, while charging, demanding, collecting, and receiving compensation from other persons for like and contemporaneous service performed by said respondent railroad company under substantially similar circumstances and conditions.

V. That the said respondent railroad company, by doing the things alleged and set forth in Paragraphs III and IV hereof, and by failing and neglecting to obey the requirements of said order of the Commission, has been and is violating the provisions of sections 2, 3, and 6 of the said act to regulate commerce. And said respondent company, acting as aforesaid, has been and is thereby burdening passengers who are compelled to pay its regularly established rates of fare, and also shippers paying regular rates of freight over its lines, with the whole or a large part of the cost to it of transporting the above-mentioned favored passengers, which results necessarily in making said established passenger and freight rates unreasonable and unjust, in violation of section 1 of said act.

VI. That petitioner is prepared to prove various instances of the discriminations and preferences alleged in Paragraphs III and IV hereof, but demands as in addition and supplementary thereto, and as warranted by the character and scope of this proceeding, that said respondent be required, upon the filing and service of this petition, to include in its verified answer hereto a statement of the same import and character as was required of it at the time of the institution of this proceeding on July 16, 1891; that is to say, that the said railroad company be required to state and make known in its answer as follows, to wit:

1. Do any persons hold passes from the said Boston and Maine Railroad Company entitling them to free or reduced rates for transportation over its lines or any part thereof; if so, under what arrangement are such passes or tickets issued? In answering this question, the Boston and Maine Railroad Company is required to state the names of the persons holding such passes or tickets, their addresses, so far as known, and, if said passes are confined to a single State, to include the names of such persons, if they hold concurrently a pass or passes or reduced-rate tickets over its lines effective in any other State than that for which the free carriage is limited to a single State. And if said passes, or any of them, or said reduced-rate tickets are issued under any arrangement or contract with said persons, then the arrangement is to be substantially stated, together with the dates thereof and the amount of transportation therein provided for, and on what account, and for what reason.

2. State the names of all persons, either under contract or otherwise, holding annual passes on December 31, 1897, over the line of the Boston and Maine Railroad or any portion thereof extending between any two of the States in which said railroad is situated, and if any of the said passes are confined to the limits of any one of the said States, then the names of all persons, and their addresses so far as known, holding passes concurrently effective over a portion of its line in any State other than that to which the said annual pass is limited as aforesaid, and not including the names of its own officers and employees immediately engaged in the operation of its own road, nor the names of the principal officers and employees of other railroad companies to whom such passes have been issued in exchange.

3. State the names and addresses, so far as known, of all persons to whom annual, trip, special, or other passes or tickets at a reduced rate of fare have been given during the two years last past, together with the reasons for the issuance thereof, and if any of said passes or reduced-rate tickets have been limited to any one State, include the names of such persons, if they concurrently held other passes or tickets effective over its line or any portion thereof in any other State, not including, however, the names of its own officers and employees immediately engaged in the operation of its own road, nor the names of the principal officers and employees of other railroad companies to whom such passes have been issued in exchange, but not excepting from the answer to this interrogatory the names of any persons to whom such passes or the names of any persons to whom such passes or reduced-rate tickets have been issued pursuant to any contract, agreement, or arrangement between the said Boston and Maine Railroad Company and such persons, ostensibly providing therefor as payment for advertising or retainers or fees as lawyers or other service.

Wherefore petitioner prays that further full and complete investigation be had in this proceeding, to the end that decision and order may be had concerning the questions remaining undetermined herein, and that said act to regulate commerce, as heretofore construed and applied by the Commission in this proceeding and embodied in said order of December 29, 1891, may be enforced.

APPLICATION OF PETITIONER FOR ORDER REQUIRING ANSWER AND FOR HEARING.

LACONIA, N. H., October 14, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: I herewith file before your honorable Commission petition of Hon Charles A. Busiel, of Laconia, and respectfully request an order citing the Boston and Maine Railroad to appear before said Commission in order that they may furnish such information as is called for by said petition, and desire a full hearing upon all questions embraced therein.

Kindly instruct me when and where we can be heard after answer is filed.

Yours, very respectfully,

E. H. SHANNON.

MOTION OF RESPONDENT TO DISMISS PETITION OF CHARLES A. BUSIEL.

[Filed November 14, 1898.]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

In the matter of the carriage of persons free or at reduced rates by the Boston and Maine Railroad. Interstate Commerce Commission. No. 308.

Motion of the Boston and Maine Railroad to dismiss the intervening petition of Charles A. Busiel.

And now comes the Boston and Maine Railroad and moves to dismiss the intervening petition of Charles A. Busiel, for the following reasons:

1. Because the petitioner, Charles A. Busiel, has no authority to intervene in this cause undertaken by the Commission itself.

2. Because the petition is indefinite and contains no specifications, without which this respondent can not properly make answer.

3. Because this Commission is not the proper tribunal before which to try any questions of failure to obey its orders.

4. Because this petition is not brought in good faith for the public weal, but because this respondent has refused from time to time the petitioner's requests for free passes over its railroad, as appears by the correspondence on file.

Wherefore, this respondent moves that the petition of Charles A. Busiel be dismissed.

BOSTON AND MAINE RAILROAD.
By its attorney, WM. H. COOLIDGE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the question we are now discussing is a very important one; that it affects vast property interests. In fact, we hardly know how vast those interests are until we pause for just a moment to consider that question. According to the census report of 1900, the total wealth of this Republic was $94,300,000,000, and if the same ratio of increase has been continued from that time to this the total wealth of this Republic to-day is $110,500,000,000.

According to the report of the railroad commissioners, the total value of the railroad property of the United States in 1904 was a little over $13,000,000,000, and if the same ratio of increase has been continued from that day to this the value of the railroad property in this Republic now is about $14,000,000,000. It is therefore just about 13 per cent of the total wealth of this country, and one dollar out of every eight of the total wealth of this country is represented by railroad valuation.

Now, in 1903, according to the figures given by the Republican campaign book, the total amount of imports into this country from foreign countries was a little over a billion dollars and the total amount of exports to foreign countries was nearly a billion and a half dollars, so that this indicates a total foreign trade of two and one-half billion dollars.

For the year ending June 30, 1904, the railroads earned as compensation from the transportation of freight and passengers $1,975,000,000 and received as total income from all sources $2,188,000,000, so that the charges for railway transportation alone are just as much as the total valuation of all the export trade and the import trade of this Republic combined. In addition to that, in 1903, the budget of the United States was, according to the Republican campaign book, $486,439,306.68. On the basis of 80,000,000 population this is a governmental charge of $6.08 per capita. The railroads charged a per capita of $27.25 to every person in the United States for every year. Therefore it is apparent that the people of the United States pay to the railroads of this country four and a half times as much as they pay to the Federal Government itself, directly and indirectly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are just one or two observations that I wish to submit on the political phase of this question. The Republicans to-day are supporting this measure, and yet this is a new position for them to take. The Democratic party for ten long years has lifted its voice in its favor, and there was no equivocation about its attitude in the campaign of 1904. We used these words, and I read from the Democratic platform of 1904:

> We demand an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation.

Now, there are two pages of the Republican campaign book of 1904 devoted to a discussion of this regulation of railway rates, and we find that the Republican campaign book, which was a text-book of Republican orators from one end of this Republic to the other, took the position, "Let well enough alone;" that you had laws that, if they were properly enforced, would solve this problem. Let me read you some of the doctrine that you then gave to the people of the United States when you were seeking election at their hands. It speaks of the passage of the Elkins law:

> This is a cause for public rejoicing. As everyone knows, the secret advantages heretofore secured by rebates and through forms of favoritism were the dishonest means by which large concerns have been crushing out their smaller rivals. Nothing has so powerfully aided the aggressions of the industrial trusts and nothing connected with these combinations has been so offensive and destructive as private bargains of one sort and another by which they secured lower freight rates than independent dealers were compelled to pay. This was the characteristic and odious evil of railroad methods up to a recent date. Within the last two years this evil has been suppressed to a very great extent—to an extent which justifies the most favorable comment. The whole rebate business has been broken up and is rapidly disappearing. This is perhaps the greatest benefit that could be conferred upon the general business interests of the country. It gives every man the same opportunity and puts the small dealer on a footing of equality with his largest rival so far as transportation charges are concerned. It is difficult to realize the advance that has been made in this regard within a comparatively short time. The salutary provisions of the Elkins law and the resolute and persistent effort of the Attorney-General during the present Administration have practically removed the gravest and greatest of railroad abuses.

In other words, before the campaign of 1904 was fought out the Republican party of this country went to the people on a declaration that they were willing to "stand pat" on existing law in reference to the railroad question, and I say when they now recede from that position that they need not be surprised when their railroad friends, who supported them, plead failure of consideration, total and complete, against them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not only that, but I want to challenge any living man in this House or in the White House, or anywhere else, to show me any published utterance of Theodore Roosevelt in favor of railway-rate regulation before the last election. In my hands I hold his letter of acceptance of the Republican party's nomination for the Presidency, and he did not say a word about what he now calls the greatest question before the American people. Gentlemen, the truth about it is that you deceived the railways on this question, and you know it. The Democratic party is consistent. It went to the people on the platform that it would do this thing if it had the power, and you said you were satisfied with existing law. You got the power, and yet you come, adopt our platform, and join hands with us to give the people this much-needed relief. You do not do it with entire good grace, either, because I heard the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] in opposition to this measure, also the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] against it and of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], equally distinguished and able, all of whom were cheered to the echo by that side because they opposed the bill. Gentlemen, you can not fool the American people. They are not exactly blind yet, and even if they were, they know that while it is the voice of Jacob from your side—it is the hand of Esau after all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the short time I have at my disposal I desire to take up only one question connected with this bill. If I have the opportunity, when we reach this bill under the five-minute rule there are certain amendments that I wish to offer to it, and what I am going to say in support of these amendments now applies equally to my own side of the Chamber as it does to the other side—to the Democratic members of the committee as well as the Republican members of the committee.

In the report of the committee the distinguished chairman of this committee makes the statement that there are very few people who favor conferring upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the general rate-making power—the power to initiate rates. With that statement I desire here and now to take issue, because here is one Member, however young and inexperienced, who has his own convictions upon the subject and is willing to vote to confer just such power, whether any other man on this side of the Chamber except himself shall vote for it. [Applause.] When we reach section 4 of this bill I shall offer certain amendments which will accomplish that purpose; and now I want to say just a word or two in defense of that general position. I heard the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] this morning when he said that the power to originate rates, the power to fix rates generally, was conferred in this bill. I want to say to him that a careful examination of the bill leads me to exactly the opposite conclusion, and if I could agree with him, as a matter of law, from the language of this bill, I should vote for it with a great deal more pleasure than I will be able to feel in voting for this bill. Now, not only that, but I want to call your attention to this fact, that the law that you are now enacting is a departure from the theory of existing law as embraced in the original interstate-commerce act and its amendments. When the law of 1887 went into effect, section 13 of that bill provided that the Commission should exercise whatever power was conferred, or was supposed to be conferred, either when there was complaint by any person, firm, or corporation interested, or from a State railroad commission of any State, or from any State railroad commissioner, or upon its own motion. Whether it had or whether it had not the rate-making power, the fact is undoubtedly true that it had just as much rate-making power on its own motion as it did in a given case, so that when you propose by this bill to withhold from the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to initiate a rate you take a radical departure from existing law, from old standards, and from the accepted ideas on this subject. Gentlemen may contend that there are so many of these rates that it will be impossible for any commission to ever fix them. I do not contend that if this power were given to the Interstate Commerce Commission it ought to exercise it in a minute or necessarily in an hour, or in a day or in a week or in a year, or even in a decade; but it ought to have that power, and surely the General Government is strong enough and great enough and rich enough to exercise it, and to exercise it wisely and well. Can you tell me that the great corporations of this country have so much wealth, so much of the brains of the country employed, that they alone are competent to fix rates? This Government is big enough, it has money enough, and it can hire brains enough to fix rates fairly in the interest of all the people, and I think that is what ought to be done.

I know that in the State of Texas, from which one of the members of this committee on this side comes, the general power to fix rates, on its own motion, is given to the railroad commission, and that that power sprang from the giant brain and lion heart of John H. Reagan. I know that in the State of Georgia, in which I live and from which two members of this committee come, the railroad commission has power, on its own motion, on its own initiative, to fix the rates all through the State, and there the idea originated in the giant brain and in the lion heart of Robert Toombs, and I say to you what these two great States have been able to do in their own jurisdiction, the Federal Government, which is much larger, and much stronger, and much richer, and much greater, can do in its own jurisdiction. Now, not only that, Mr. Chairman, but I want to call your attention to another fact. Under this plan which you have adopted of fixing a rate only in a given case, when there is a complainant; if there are about a million and a half rates to be fixed, as has been suggested, and you fix a rate from Florida to New York, for instance, in a given case, what is going to happen to all the rest of the country before they can get their cases heard, one by one, and their changed rates enforced? It is going to permit rank favoritism between various localities and individuals—in favor of the person or locality whose case is first heard, and against the person or locality whose case is last heard—that must continue during all the years while these cases are pending before the Commission and in the courts. Besides, what relief is this bill going to give to the people of the United States generally? Do you believe your average constituent, and mine, will find relief from abuses that are perpetrated upon him and extortions from which he suffers, in this complicated matter of freight rates, unless the Government has some agency to look into this business for him and discover the truth? No; they will continue to suffer in ignorance in the future, as they have suffered in ignorance in the past.

The rich shipper, the rich man, the big concern may find out his wrongs, but the poor man, the little shipper, and the little concern will not discover his. Not only that, but let me ask you this; even though they find it out, is the average man going to be able to hire a lawyer to come up here before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then test his rights there and then through the Supreme Court of the United States? It is utterly absurd. They will not be able to do it. They have not the money to do it, and they are afraid to embark on any such costly enterprise. The truth about it is that the railroads of this country are so big that the little fellows can not fight them, and the only way you can protect the mass of the people from them is to provide a strong governmental agency that will not only inquire into what is right and into what is wrong, but will proceed to enforce the right and condemn the wrong.

Now, just one word more, Mr. Chairman, and then I shall have finished. In this matter, in my humble judgment, the people of the United States are begging you for bread and you are giving them a stone. They ask you for a "square deal" and you give them one that is only part fair. I am going to vote for this bill because it is the best one that has yet been offered in Congress that I have had an opportunity to vote for; but it does not go half far enough. We ought to give the Commission that same power that the Congress of 1887 thought they were giving to them, namely, the right to fix rates when a complaint is made by a person, firm, or corporation interested, or by a State railroad commission, or when the Commission determines on its own motion and after its own investigation, that injustice is being done, wrong is being perpetrated, and right and fairness and justice withheld.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that these are the sentiments of the people of the district that I have the honor to represent on this floor. I know that this is what they want, and I believe in my heart of hearts that this is right, fair, and just, and I hope when the bill is on its passage I shall at least be permitted to offer the amendment that would accomplish this most desirable purpose and give the Commission power to protect the weak as well as the strong, the poor as well as the rich. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BOUTELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following title:

H. R. 4226. An act granting an increase of pension to William Painter;

H. R. 4742. An act granting an increase of pension to Edward Coy;

H. R. 4744. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas O'Conner;

H. R. 9382. An act granting a pension to Mariam T. Shreve;

H. R. 5289. An act to provide for the selection of grand and petit jurors for the district courts in the Territory of Oklahoma.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON].

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, the country is to be congratulated upon the unanimity with which the bill now under consideration, touching the matter of railway rate legislation, has been reported to this House by the able committee having jurisdiction of the subject and the vote by which this House will approve of the work done by that committee. The subject is one of absorbing interest to the people of the country.

The legislation proposed in the pending measure is demanded by the general public. Its most conspicuous and enthusiastic supporter is the President of the United States. His great popularity makes him a powerful factor in behalf of any measure. In his honesty, sincerity, and fearlessness the public has supreme confidence. Although not the originator of the proposition, he is entitled to much credit for the persistency with which he has advocated action. His public addresses and messages have done much to crystallize public sentiment and direct public opinion. Others equally honest and sincere have for years been advocating similar legislation. The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission have for ten years been knocking at the doors of Congress for strength to carry out the purpose for which the Commission was created. In many of the States similar legislation for the control of State commerce has been enacted.

In Wisconsin this cause has had its earnest advocates. The subject has been before the people for years, and as a result that State has placed upon its statute books one of the most drastic State commission laws of any in the Union.

It is with pleasure, therefore, that I lend my voice and vote in support of this measure, because in so doing I know I correctly interpret the wishes of a very large majority of those whose commission I hold.

Opponents of this measure have tried to make it appear as if we were about to enact legislation revolutionary in character, wrong in principle, and totally destructive of individual and property rights. They have tried to frighten us by asserting that we propose to place in the hands of a political rate-making body the power to make all the rates for all the railroads in all sections of the country. They tell us that there are now in the United States 64,050 railroad stations, that there are 7,174 different articles classified under various schedules upon which rates for transportation are charged, and that under this legislation this Commission would have the right to make 459,694,700 different rates.

To simplify the issue and clear away the fog and mist with which the opponents of this measure have attempted to surround it, let us first find out what it does not propose to do. It does not authorize or direct the Government to adjust on its own initiative the railroad rates of the country. It does not confer upon the Government the right to carry on the business or any part of the business of the railroads. It is not a step in the direction of Government ownership.

The purpose of this bill is to confer more clearly upon a body created by Congress the authority which Congress undoubtedly has of regulating, not only the matter of rate making, but the practices, regulations, and other acts of companies engaged in interstate commerce for the purpose of preventing discriminations.

From the time the occupation of common carriers began—a long time before the railroad was known—it has always been a rule of law that the rates to be charged by such common carriers should not only be just and reasonable, but should be open to all upon equal terms under like conditions. This was the common law of England, and as such it became the law of the several States of this country.

The Constitution confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations. There is, therefore, no question but what there resides in the Federal Government a reserved power of supervision and control, a power that the nation must exercise in the interests of equal citizenship.

By the act of 1887 Congress conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to regulate and control interstate commerce. The passage of that act was opposed by the common carriers. It was then openly declared that such action would take the control of property out of the hands of its owners and invest it in a political body.

All sorts of predictions were then made as to the disaster which would result. The legislation was enacted, a Commission was appointed, and it undertook the discharge of its duties. One of the duties which it was supposed to have, and which the courts later held it did not have, and which by this measure it is proposed positively to confer upon this Commission, was the right to say what, in its judgment, should be a reasonable rate in a case where, upon complaint and investigation after a full hearing, it had been found that the rate complained of was unreasonable and unjust. The Commission performed what it supposed was its duty in a number of instances covering a series of years, during which time no disaster came to the railroads or their stockholders. The Supreme Court held, in the Maximum Rate Case, that Congress had not given to the Commission the power to fix future rates, but that its only power was to say whether a rate then in existence was or was not an unreasonable rate. If it found the rate was unreasonable, it could so declare, and could direct that the railroad company should no longer impose such unreasonable rate. It had no power, however, under the court's decision to say what in that particular case would be a reasonable rate or to punish the railroad company if it did not see fit to observe the order of the Commission. This measure gives it that power.

I have never been able to understand the argument made by the opponents of this legislation that the Commission, being sufficiently informed upon the subject to be able to declare what in a particular instance was an unreasonable rate, should be incapable of determining what in that particular case would be a reasonable rate. To find that a given rate is unreasonable the Commission must first know what would be reasonable. We can not say that any particular line of conduct is wrong unless we know what would be right. We must know what is good in order to distinguish the bad.

Why, therefore, should not the Commission, in a case where it has found the rate fixed to be unreasonable and unfair, have the power to say what in that case and under those circumstances would be a reasonable and fair rate?

For my part it seems as if the Commission ought to have that power in order to make its work effective.

This measure does not give to the Commission power to initiate rates, nor does it authorize the Commission on its own volition to engage in a crusade against existing conditions. If it has power under existing law to make investigation without complaint first being made, the record does not show that it ever abused that power or that the interests of the common carriers were ever seriously affected thereby.

There is reserved to the party aggrieved after the Commission has acted the right to have the lawfulness of the Commission's order reviewed by the judiciary. The right to appeal to the courts for a protection of his rights and to prevent illegal interference therewith is reserved alike to the shipper and the carrier.

One of the things which distinguishes the American system from all other systems of government is the power given the judiciary to see that no right secured by the supreme law of the land is impaired or destroyed by legislation. The perpetuity of our institutions and the liberty enjoyed under them depend in a very large degree upon the power of the courts to declare null and void legislation which is repugnant to the Constitution.

Any act of this Commission that will prevent a common carrier from so operating its property as to earn a fair return on its investment would deprive such carrier of its property without due course of law, and deny to it the equal protection of the laws which the Constitution guarantees, and therefore the rights of such carrier can be fully protected by the court.

The courts are always open, ready and willing to discharge the duty which rests upon them, and to these courts the party aggrieved under this legislation can go for relief. There can not possibly be, therefore, any danger that the property of the stockholders will be confiscated or destroyed by any act of the Commission under this legislation.

The need of this legislation does not arise so much from the necessity for the regulation of rates as it does for the regulation of practices and discriminations indulged in by the railroads and which are absolutely destructive to the business interests of persons and communities.

The people of the country are not crying out so loudly against the rates now in force as against the manner of their enforcement. The people do demand that in the transportation of commerce every individual and every community shall enjoy equal opportunity with every other individual or community under similar conditions. The people believe that every individual ought to have not only the opportunity to know what the transportation charge will be upon any article he may wish to send from one part of the country to another, but to know that no other individual shall have a lower rate than he for the same service. In other words, what the people demand now is not lower rates, but equal rates; what they complain of is not excessive rates, but unequal rates.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] seems to fear that this "political rate-making body," as he calls the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall, through its decisions, work destruction to not only the railroad interests but to the commercial interests in different sections of the country. I wonder if he, as a lawyer, has ever called the supreme court of his State a "political body" in the sense he now uses that term.

This Commission will be no more a political body than the courts of the country are political courts. Our judges are either appointed by the President, upon the advice and consent of the Senate, or elected by the people. Their term of office continues either for a certain number of years or during good behavior. In any event they owe their selection either to the people or to the appointive power of the President, and yet we have felt that the people's interests were always safe in their hands.

I therefore have no fear that the power given to this Commission will ever be used except in a lawful and proper manner. But what does the gentleman offer in place of the Commission? The peculiar feature of this debate has been that the opponents of this measure criticise it, but offer nothing as a substitute.

The rate-making power of the country, which affects for weal or woe the interests of all the people, is now vested in the hands of not to exceed seven men. I believe the commercial interests of the country will be as safe in the hands of the seven men who will constitute this Commission as they are in the hands of seven men who now practically control the railroad systems of this country.

While there may be many employees engaged in working out the detail of rate making, yet, as a matter of fact, the rates are actually made by the manager of a system under orders from his superiors to so conduct the business that dividends shall be returned to the stockholders.

We know there is no longer any healthy competition between these systems. Free from control or regulations, the railroads have been administered in the interests of the owners and not of the public generally. If it was found either necessary or advisable, from a business standpoint, to favor certain shippers or certain localities, this has been done. Large shippers have dictated the price at which their commodities should be carried. Evidence lately disclosed shows that the meat-packers' combine, instead of paying the schedules published by the railroads, have compelled the carrying of their products at a greatly reduced rate under fear of boycott. The Standard Oil Company has not only dictated the price at which its own commodities should be carried, but has, by reason of its powerful influence, compelled tribute from carriers who transport the product of its competitors. While these special shippers were thus, either voluntarily or otherwise, being favored by lower rates, the small shipper has had to pay whatever the carrier charged. This discrimination has brought bankruptcy to individuals, stagnation to communities, and destruction to competition. As a result, these specially favored have prospered excessively. Their millions have come not so much through honest industry as by reason of sharp practice and skillful manipulation of freight rates.

The Elkins law recently enacted to prevent rebates and discriminations has been of much benefit. Under it the ordinary system of rebates has practically ceased to exist.

In various parts of the country there now exist auxiliary companies known as "private car lines," "terminal lines," "refrigerator lines," and others, all created largely for the purpose of demanding a portion of the transportation charge in return for some slight service rendered, and which, in fact, is only another form of giving rebate to those specially favored.

One of the important features of this proposed legislation is that which defines the word "railroad" and the word "transportation" in a manner to include all these auxiliary companies and all the instrumentalities of a common carrier.

Enact this measure and all the practices and regulations of these auxiliary companies, as well as those of the carriers themselves, will be subject to regulation and control by the Commission.

Under the power granted in this measure the Commission will be better able to acquire evidence for the enforcement of the Elkins law, will be able to give greater publicity to railroad methods, and to protect the interests of the people against those who, through the aid of vicious practices and regulations, have profited at their expense.

In my judgment this measure will go far toward solving the evils complained of by the people. Under this legislation the railroads and the people will alike enjoy a complete remedy against injustice. Each are entitled to this, neither should ask for more, neither should have less.

The House in enacting this legislation responds to the demand of the country for what it believes is right. The people will not longer submit to a system of control of the public highways of the country which leaves private shippers certain of nothing, but that they are not treated on the same terms as their neighbors, which bankrupts small shippers and enormously increases the wealth of the larger ones, which destroys some communities that it may create others. There is no disposition to unduly harass or annoy the railroad systems. There is, however, a demand that the public shall be protected against injustice, and that corporate bodies shall respond to the reasonable and righteous demand of the people. The time has come when the people will insist that their rights shall be respected; that in the enactment and execution of laws their welfare shall not be overlooked, and that in their desire for greed and gain the public-service corporations shall not override the will of the people, but shall be made to recognize the fact that the servant is not above its master, and that the creature is not more powerful than its creator.

Believing, therefore, that the proposed measure is not only just and fair to the common carriers, but absolutely right and necessary for the public welfare; believing that it correctly represents the view of the President and wishes of the people, I propose to give it my cordial and earnest support, and trust that it may soon be written upon the statute books of our country, and that the people may receive from it the benefit they hope and expect. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES].

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, being, in the language of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, the minority leader of this body, one of the kids of the House, I can only expect your indulgence for a very short time.

I do not desire to speak in support of this bill because I fear it will not pass this body by almost a unanimous vote; neither do I wish to speak in favor of the bill because I believe anything I might say could influence that branch of the legislative department of our Government occupying the other end of the Capitol. The fact is, I am of the opinion that august body has heard from home—the people of the several States—during the past few months, and now stands ready to hail with delight the opportunity to support the measure that bears the honored name of the distinguished gentleman from the great State of Iowa.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do want to speak in favor of this bill because I want the consciousness of having gone on record in the early part of my experience as a Member of this honorable body favoring this bill, because I believe it to be a measure that is fair, practical, and just. I believe it to be a measure that is equitable both to the shippers and the carriers of the country. Therefore I desire to assign a few good reasons why I favor the bill and why I shall vote for it.

Some gentlemen who have spoken undertook to go into a complete analysis of the bill, but I shall content myself with an examination at this time of its caption.

I observe in the caption of the bill it is recited that it is the object of the measure to amend the act of February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Hence I infer a law has been on the statute books of this country for nineteen years the object of which is to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with authority to adjust differences and controversies arising between the shippers and the carriers. I also observe from the language of this bill there is not only existing laws on the subject of transportation and rates charged by the carriers engaged in interstate commerce, but the laws which do exist are not far enough reaching in their effect.

I also observe there are certain evils existing regarding rates as fixed by the railroads and transportation companies, and that existing laws ought to be so amended as to afford remedies for existing wrongs.

Is the author of this bill wrong when he assumes that there is pressing necessity for legislation such as this measure contemplates? Was the committee wrong when it voted unanimously to recommend the bill favorably?

Is the record wrong that has been made up from the various hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Last, but not least, are the people of our country wrong in their almost unanimous appeal to Congress to enact remedial legislation along these lines?

In other words, if those who favor this bill are right, it is high time we get about our business and enact it into law.

It is my opinion there has never been a public question in this country since the days of the Revolutionary war on which there has been such unanimity of opinion among our people as there is to-day of the rate bill.

What does it mean to see this House almost solidly united in the support of this bill? It means, Mr. Chairman, the people of this country have spoken, and this body merely reflects their opinion. It can truly be said the House of Representatives is the people's branch of the legislative department of our Government.

There can be no doubt that the time has come when legislation affecting the transportation problem in this country is needed. If so, let us rise to the occasion and discharge our whole duty.

I am here reminded of the very able speech of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] a few days ago.

I am also reminded of the very able speech of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

I feel these gentlemen took the most extreme views of this question—the gentleman from Pennsylvania opposing the bill and the gentleman from Alabama supporting it.

I deem it my duty, as there seems to be a difference of opinion among gentlemen on this question, to here strike a happy medium or golden mean between these two extreme views and settle this question, and settle it right, for all time to come. I feel I ought to do this. I also feel when I shall have finished, my purpose will be accomplished and the matter settled. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania fears if this bill passes capital will become uneasy and withdraw from investment. He fears this is a step in the direction of anarchy and socialism. He fears this is a step which will ultimately result in Government ownership of railroads. He even fears our whole economic system will be disturbed and the splendid prosperity of our country destroyed.

Why should the gentleman be so alarmed? I assure him there is not a Member of this House but what wants to see every commercial interest of our great country thrive. I for one am opposed to Government ownership of railroads; but I do believe it is the duty of the Government to look well to the matter of the interstate commerce of the country.

The gentleman from Alabama refers to the privileged classes of this country which have been permitted to thrive and fatten under the present system of government while the common people have been oppressed. I do not believe any class of our people has been oppressed; on the contrary, I believe the great mass of our people have been progressing with the rest of the world. I truly believe the laboring people of our country are better clothed, better fed, better educated, and better housed than ever before in our history. In fact, there is no people in the civilized world who enjoy so fully the high degree of the comforts of life as do our people. The fact is our people are better and more generally employed to-day than ever before in our history—not only in our history, but in the world's history. In short, our people are practically happy, satisfied, and contented.

Now, to the point. I favor this bill because I believe it to be a conservative, practical, and equitable measure. I do not favor it because I want to punish railroad companies; neither do I favor it because I believe our people are being downtrodden and greatly oppressed, and that this bill is intended to revolutionize our whole economic system.

However, I do want to caution the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] that they ought not accuse those of us who favor this bill as favoring anarchy and socialism.

I rather believe this bill is calculated to bar socialism and anarchy, because it expresses the wishes of the people of our country, and the people can always be trusted. Socialism and anarchy do not thrive under free government like ours.

Hence we should not forget the time-honored and basic principles of our Government.

I desire to say just a word further before beginning the discussion of my subject proper, that I may be fully understood. I do not believe in enacting any law in a spirit of revenge. I am not one who believes it necessary to punish railroads. I rather like the great transcontinental railways of our country for what they have done for civilization. We must not forget the fact that the builders of railroads in the early days were among the honored pioneers of this country. They blazed the way to higher civilization and made it possible for us to enjoy the manifold blessings of the splendid civilization we now enjoy. We must not forget the fact also that in a great majority of instances the pioneer builders of our railroads not only encountered great difficulties, but found themselves the most gigantic financial failures the country ever saw. [Applause.]

That building railroads was a hazardous business in the early days there is no doubt; and because it was a hazardous business the railroads, or, I should say, the builders of railroads, appealed to the Federal Government to aid them in their undertakings. They also appealed to State governments, county governments, and municipal governments. The basis of their appeal was that the building of railroads was a public necessity, therefore the public ought to contribute of their land and money to the building of the railroads. Federal, State, county, and municipal governments accepted the explanation given by the railroads and contributed liberally.

It is authentically estimated that the Federal Government gave the railroads from time to time enough of its public domain, which, if in a contiguous body, could be converted into five great States equal in area to Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Ohio, and Indiana. State governments and county governments and municipal governments all gave liberally to the railroads of their money and property. Some of the counties in my own State (Missouri) gave so liberally the people have yet outstanding railroad debts. One county (St. Clair County, Mo.) is required to hold its sessions of the county court in the woods to escape the enforcement of the law on the railroad-bond question. [Laughter.]

It now occurs to me our railroads have forgotten the time in the history of our country when they had to appeal to the Government for aid. Now, when the Government desires to inquire into matters and things relating to railroad affairs, it is claimed the Government is overstepping the constitutional limitations, and the railroads are exceedingly private corporations, while the courts of the country have repeatedly declared the railroads to be common carriers and public highways.

I take it the review of the history of railroad building in this country brings us face to face with the fundamental right of the Government to at least exercise a restraining influence over the railways and transportation companies engaged in the interstate commerce of our country.

It is to this right of the Government to which I now desire to address myself.

To meet and discharge wisely the responsibility of regulating commerce and to bring the railways and other transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce back to their legitimate sphere and have them serve fully the purpose for which they were created, in my opinion, is the greatest question with which the present Congress has to deal.

Gentlemen have argued on the floor of this House during the progress of this debate, and I am sure the railways all argue it, that no substantial reasons exist for the passage of this bill. It is argued it is a step in the direction of anarchy and socialism. They express the belief such legislation will prove detrimental to the whole commercial system and that it is inconsistent with the principles of free government. They are of the opinion, should this bill become a law, capital will be withdrawn from investment and the whole commercial world suffer.

Gentlemen may be sincere in their contentions, but those who are of this opinion are certainly in the extreme minority as compared with the great bulk of our people, who are of the opposite opinion.

The fact is, we are confronted with a condition from which there is no escape, and as the chosen representatives of the sovereign people we must enact this bill into law. The condition is that the people of this country are demanding legislation calculated to prevent certain unjust discriminations in the matter of freight rates, charges, and rebates as practiced by certain carriers of the country. [Applause.]

If the public is suffering serious wrong; if there are far-reaching abuses in the transportation of our commerce; if the railways are not only carrying the commerce of the country, but controlling the commerce of the country, determining where it shall be massed, where the markets are even located; if they are discriminating in favor of big shippers as against little shippers; if they are creating and fostering monopolies, then there rests upon the Congress the responsibility to act at once, and act with determination and precision.

I say it behooves the Congress of the United States to rise to the occasion and do its patriotic duty by enacting this bill into law. That the president of the United States stands ready to give the Executive approval to the measure there is no doubt, because he has expressed himself at sundry times and on divers occasions as favoring such legislation. I am warranted in making this statement, because he has so expressed himself in his various messages to Congress.

The transportation question is one that lies close to all the people. It affects every individual, every community, and all parts of the country either directly or indirectly. Both capital and labor are mutually dependent upon transportation in the production of wealth, let it either be manufacturing, mining, or agriculture; in fact, all the occupations of men in the civilized world are dependent upon it.

It is not only important that lines of transportation be established, but it is important that after they are established the rates be just and the service be adequate. This proposition then naturally divides itself into two phases: The first is the adequacy of the service; the second is the justice of the charges or rates.

It is to the latter condition to which I shall now invite your attention, because the people are not so much complaining at the service afforded by the carriers as they are complaining of unjust charges and unfair discriminations. The community which is denied the opportunity to move its products to market at fair rates and upon an even footing with a competing community must inevitably suffer great loss. Therefore, the very growth, development, and prosperity of every community, to a very marked degree, depends upon the transportation of the products of the community at large.

The truth is, the founders of our Republic saw at the very outset and in the general order of things it was necessary that lines of transportation be established; and at the same time they saw the necessity of fixing a basis of equality for each community in the transportation of its goods, wares, men, and merchandise, as related to every other community. We have to go to no other source for authority on which to base this argument than the Constitution of the United States, because it is therein ordained that the Congress of the United States shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and that such commerce should be equitably carried on. It was the evident intention of the fathers that the door of opportunity should be open equally wide to each and every community of the thirteen original States. If that was the spirit of the law then, it is the spirit of the law now, because these were the men who builded for the future. In their wisdom they laid and grounded the very corner stones of this Republic upon the eternal and everlasting principles of equality and fairness, thereby making it possible today for us to enjoy the manifold blessings of freedom and independence.

Sirs, in the language of Rudyard Kipling, we can not lose sight of these time-honored and basic principles of free government in this great and strenuous age of commercial activity, "Lest we forget, lest we forget," and I beg of you, let us not forget.

Yet those who oppose the bill fear we are overstepping our constitutional authority. I tell you where the trouble is: We are not suffering so much from our efforts to overstep the bounds of constitutional authority as we suffer from lack of properly exercising our powers under the Constitution.

Tell me our Constitution is so void of equity that it does not clothe the legislative department of our Government with ample authority to correct existing evils and I will tell you, then, ours is no longer a "government by the people, of the people, and for the people," which I do not concede.

It will be remembered, in the outset of my remarks, I called your attention to the fact that the railroads of the country do not occupy the same position with reference to the people that the average private corporation does, for the reason that the Government assisted the railroads by donating land and money in their building.

I here wish to discuss briefly the relation of railroads to State and Federal governments.

To begin with, the railway corporations are creatures purely and simply of the State governments. From the States they get their special powers and special privileges. The State vests in the transportation company the greatest possible powers when it grants the franchise to do business within the State, and even makes it possible for the corporation to take private property without the consent of the owner. I here mean the method by which land is acquired by railway companies under condemnation proceedings in the various States of the Union. Why is it possible that a railway company can do this? Is it because it is the bare intention of State governments to bestow special favors on the carriers? Or is it that they may be the better enabled thereby to discharge their duties to the public? It must be for the latter reason. It could be justified on no other ground. The fact is, the courts of this country have repeatedly held that the State would have no right to divest its citizen of his property except the purpose to which the property is put be a public one.

Hence, taking land for railroad purposes must be taking it for a public purpose. Again, I wish to insist such an act could be justified on no other ground; and the fact that it is taken for a public purpose is the sole justification for taking it at all.

Then tell me that the States have not the right to control State commerce. To prove beyond question of doubt the several States of the Union have the right to at least exercise a restraining influence over the railways of their respective States, I wish to give briefly the history of State railway legislation.

To begin with, under our form of government—Federal and State—a division of powers and responsibilities with respect to transportation and the protection of the commerce of the country at large is fixed by constitutional limitation. Yet gentlemen fear we are overriding the Constitution. Commerce is either State or interstate commerce. A shipment beginning and ending in a State is State commerce; hence the carrier undertaking the transportation must be subject to the laws of that State, because the General Government can exercise no authority. If the shipper is to be protected in his rights, both as to efficient service (and, as I said before, there is little complaint from that source) and reasonable rates without being discriminated against, he must look to the government of his State. He must do this because such is a transaction that is purely domestic. On the other hand, a shipment consigned in one State to a point in another State is interstate commerce. This is necessarily true from the time it starts to move until it reaches its destination.

With respect to such a shipment, the State has no authority and can afford the public no relief from wrongs at the hands of the carriers. Hence the absolute and imperative necessity that the Federal Government vest sufficient authority in the Interstate Commerce Commission to at least exercise a restraining influence over the transportation companies, which this bill seeks to do and will do if enacted into law. These are, to my mind, some of the fundamental reasons on which the right of the Government to enact such laws rests. These principles were recognized nineteen years ago, when the present interstate-commerce law was enacted, and these are the reasons to-day why this bill, which seeks to amend this law, should be enacted into law.

While it is a known fact that most of the States of the Union have created commissions, the object of which is to exercise a controlling or restraining influence over the railways engaged in State commerce, it is also a fact that the public at large has little definite information concerning the experience of those States in which those commissions have been created and the conditions and circumstances leading up to the enactment of present laws. That I may more fully demonstrate the correctness of my position by alluding to the question of State regulation of common carriers, I submit the following observations: The truth is the States lead off in an effort at regulation of railways and railway rates. The present interstate-commerce law was enacted in 1887, and the States began in 1871, I believe. Minnesota led the States; then came Illinois in 1873 and Iowa and Wisconsin in 1874.

The great central West, or Northwest, was the pioneer in railway-rate regulation, and it is the great West and central West to-day that stand in solid phalanx in support of this measure. It is true other sections of the country are supporting the measure, but it is doubted by some that they are so ardently supporting the measure as is the West.

A gentleman whose name I can not recall at this time made certain references a few days ago in a speech on the floor of this House to the so-called "Granger legislation."

I am here reminded that it might be well to review some of the objections that were urged by the railways at the time the States took up the idea of creating State boards or railroad commissions. It was claimed that railroad construction would cease, and that railroad business would be completely crippled and come to a standstill—harrowing stories, just such as we have heard during this debate coming from those who oppose the bill, that dire and awful consequences would follow the enactment of such laws. Let us now see whether or not these consequences did follow. It will be remembered the people said the railroads were wrong, just as we say they are mistaken to-day.

In the year 1871 there were 12,401 miles of railroad in the four States that enacted this so-called antirailroad legislation from 1871 to 1875, viz, Minnesota, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin. In the same States in 1873 there were 14,627 miles, showing the building of railroads had increased instead of having come to a standstill. In 1875 there were 15,515 miles of road in the same States, again showing the building of railroads had not come to a standstill. This period of time covers the period when these same States were enacting this alleged hostile railroad legislation.

Now, to prove that railroad interests did not suffer in the States enacting this so-called "antirailroad" legislation, I wish to submit the status of railroad building in four States which were about on a par with Minnesota, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin in population and in general development in which no railroad legislation was had during the same period.

The four States selected are Missouri, Nebraska, Indiana, and Michigan. In these States in 1871 there were 9,168 miles of railroad. In 1873 there were 10,932 miles of road, in 1875 there were 11,381 miles.

The figures presented show that Minnesota, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin held their own in railroad construction with the States of Missouri, Nebraska, Indiana, and Michigan. In fact, they did better than Missouri, Nebraska, Indiana, and Michigan. I take it these States with which they have been compared are four States that were about as nearly on the same footing as any four that could have been selected in the whole United States. Hence this is not only a just comparison, but abundant proof that the railroad interests did not suffer as a result of the legislation enacted by the States, which was so much opposed by the railroads. The question might present itself that the railroad business is not shown by these figures to have been in a very prosperous condition at that time. While this is true, the cause is easily traceable to conditions resulting from the general depression which affected the commercial world in all its phases at that time and not to the legislation of the States on the subject of railroad control by State boards.

Now, to the question proper. I want this bill to pass because it is calculated to relieve the people from excessive transportation charges and discriminations and rebates.

There seems to me to be an effort on the part of the transportation companies to have us feel that this is such a complex and intricate subject that it is dangerous to meddle with it. I remember well within a very short time after I was elected to Congress in 1904 I received a letter from a certain shipper in Missouri (not in my district, however, and not a stockholder in a railroad company). The nature of the communication was something like this: The matter of railroad transportation is one that so affects the community at large that it behooves the Congress of the United States to move cautiously along these lines; that, as a shipper, he believed the public at large had little cause to complain at the treatment received at the hands of the transportation companies; that his experience led him to believe, as a rule, all people were fairly treated, and the public was suffering largely from imaginary and not real evils. A little investigation on my part convinced me that as a shipper he was getting rates cheaper to Chicago, Minneapolis, and Omaha than other shippers were who were not half so far away. If it is a fact—and I am fully convinced it is—that favoritism, partiality, and unjust indiscriminations exist, then this bill ought to pass.

These discriminations with respect to communities, individuals, and enterprises ought to be stopped, because they tend to retard a good, healthy development and growth locally in many sections of the country. On the other hand, these discriminations serve as an undue stimulus to certain localities, which produce abnormal commercial conditions and which ought not to exist. Reasonably good service, and at a reasonably fair cost of service, is all the people want. That is all this bill seeks to accomplish.

Gentlemen fail to agree as to what the true scope and power of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be. They philosophize on the ultimate outcome of some abstract proposition or hypothetical case. Why not get down to business and enact this bill into a law? Let the Commission get to work under the operation of the new law; then we will see what the results are. There is too much time, in my opinion, spent in speculation and the discussion of abstract propositions. While I am of the opinion that the Commission under certain conditions ought to be clothed with absolute power to fix schedules, yet because this bill may not go that far, I do say it is an improvement over the present law. It is certainly a step in the right direction.

While I am also of the opinion that the great body of the people who suffer either directly or indirectly from these excessive transportation charges can not appear before the Commission, yet they will be relieved practically by the individual who does appear before the Commission and prosecutes his cause to final issue, just as it is in the courts of the country. Many citizens enjoy benefits under the laws that are tested by those who carry the cases through the courts just as fully as though they were able to carry on litigation themselves. The Commission should be clothed with full power to enforce publicity in respect to all matters pertaining to the public interests, because, invested with this power, the necessity of prosecutions would less frequently arise. But shall I vote against the bill because it may not meet my approval in this regard? No! I shall vote for the bill, not for what of good it does not contain, but for that of the good it does contain.

In my opinion this bill, when enacted into law, will afford relief. The extent to which this relief will be afforded depends, like all other laws, upon the extent of its enforcement; and I here wish to assume that every man who is on the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day and who may be on that Commission in the future is and will be such type of American citizen that his purpose will be at all times to equitably enforce the law. I have a right to assume this because no man has a right to go on such a commission except he be the highest type of American citizen, except he be well seasoned in statesmanship, well tried in public service, and his patriotism, integrity, and ability beyond question. The selection of the Commission, therefore, becomes a question of importance, and, in my judgment, the bill has wisely provided that the selection be by appointment rather than by election. I favor this method because it sometimes occurs that in the heat of contest for place political parties do not take into account all these essential qualifications the candidate should possess; consequently public officers do not always measure up fully to every requirement. Hence I favor the method provided for in this bill, viz, that the Commission should be appointed by the Executive.

Gentlemen argue against this bill because they say they are against public ownership of railroads. I am also against government ownership of railroads. The author of this bill, I assure you, is against government ownership of railroads; and I also assure you a majority of the committee from which the bill comes are against government ownership of railroads. I take it this particular objection gentlemen have urged has no application to this measure.

While the Government does not seek ownership of railroads, and while I should oppose any such effort on the part of the Government, yet I do say the Government has a duty to perform in the regulation of the railway transportation business of this country, because the service is a public service, which makes it, in a sense, essentially a function of Government. What is the nature of a railroad company in its capacity? It should be public, while the truth is it is more often a monopoly, because it shuts out all other competition. By a "monopoly" I understand it is meant that which takes unto itself all, or the whole thing. This may not be Webster, but this is the way I think of the word at this time and in the sense in which I have used it. Why is a railroad company a monopoly? Because all the people, as a rule, who live near it, or tributary to it, market their products and receive their supplies over it. They have no other alternative.

The State in which they live may have permitted the railroad company to take the land on which it has laid its tracks and built its switches from the individual, yet he is dependent upon the company. The people must accept the service offered, cart their produce away, haul in their supplies, or walk. The fact is, the corporation, which is a creature of the State and the recipient of public gifts and favors, in many cases is permitted to tyrannize over the people. I shall vote for this bill because it seeks to protect the people against these wrongs and injustices at the hands of the corporations, the creatures of the States, I shall vote for this bill because I say it is the plain duty of the Government to protect its citizens against unjust discriminations.

One of our ablest Supreme Court judges once said:

> The superintending power over the highways and the charges imposed upon the public for their use has always been in the Government.

That such is not only right, but necessary to protect the people against extortion, there can be no kind of doubt. The same duty the State owes its citizens in the protection of their rights under State laws the Government owes its citizens in the protection of their rights under Federal laws.

The act of 1887 provides for a Commission of five men, to be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate. The act also provides that all transportation charges shall be reasonable and just and that every unreasonable and unjust charge shall be unlawful. It further provides that the Commission is required to execute and enforce all provisions of the act; that it shall investigate and inquire into all complaints of violations of the law, and that it shall execute the law by petition to the court, and the court shall enforce all lawful orders made by the Commission.

At the time Congress enacted the present law it was thought the Commission was vested with ample authority to supervise rates and to issue orders and decrees with respect to what rates should be. As a result of the various legal controversies between shippers and carriers in the courts the authority of the Commission has been narrowed down until to-day it is powerless to afford relief.

In other words, by judicial decision the Commission has practically been deprived of the powers it was originally thought to possess.

In the annual report of the Commission in 1897 it is stated:

> As construed by the Supreme Court, the carrier is given the right to establish and charge rates independent of the judgment of the Commission and independent of the action of any court or tribunal. The right to establish, charge, and receive unreasonable and unjust charges is not prohibited, and in respect to charges which may be demanded and received for any transportation service, the carriers are made the judges in their own cases as to what is reasonable and just.

This is the statement of the Commission. The Commission was evidently led to make this statement as a result of its ten years of fruitless endeavors to enforce the law. Hence we are warranted at this time in assuming that all the people and the Commission believed had been secured by the act of 1887 has been swept away by court decisions. If this is true, there is but one thing for Congress to do now, and that is to pass this bill.

The Commission from year to year since 1897 in its annual reports to Congress has made it clear that it was practically shorn of its power.

We ought either to pass this rate bill or abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission, and no longer keep up the present empty pretense. Again, in 1902, the Commission in its report, in speaking of the defect in the law, said:

> That this imperfection is curable is conceded. The fullest power of correction is vested in Congress, and the exercise of that power is demanded in the interest of the public welfare. The sense of the wrongs and injustice which can not be prevented in the present state of the law, as well as the duty enjoined by the act itself, impels the Commission to reaffirm its recommendations for the reasons so often and so fully set forth in previous reports and before the Congressional committees. Moreover, in view of the rapid disappearance of railway competition and the maintenance of rates fixed by combination, attended as they are by substantial advances in the charges on many articles of household necessity, the Commission regards this matter as increasingly grave, and desires to emphasize its conviction that the safeguards required for the protection of the public will not be provided until the regulating statute is thoroughly revised.

What does such a report mean? Is it possible these men of whom this great Commission is composed are mistaken in what they so appealingly urge in their reports to Congress? I can not believe they are mistaken. I now wish to discuss briefly the situation that is referred to in this last report, wherein it is stated: "Moreover, in view of the rapid disappearance of railway competition," etc., What! Does the Commission say that competition is rapidly disappearing in transportation? I say it so states, and I further say there is no longer practically any competition among the railroads of this country, the contentions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to the contrary notwithstanding.

I here wish to remind you of the contentions of these gentlemen who so eloquently declared that competition among railroads was the just and proper means by which this rate controversy should be determined. How, in the name of common sense and human reason, can competition correct evils if there is practically no competition, as is contended by the Commission in its report in 1902?

That my contention may be more fully explained, that there is no longer competition among railroads, I beg to submit the following table, which shows that almost the entire railroads of the United States are controlled by six sets of financiers. Then talk about competition in the railroad business!

Table showing number of roads embraced, mileage, and capitalization of each of the six great systems.

Classification.	Number of roads.	Mileage.	Capitalization.
Vanderbilt	132	21,888	$1,169,198,132
Pennsylvania	250	19,300	1,822,402,255
Morgan-Hill	225	47,200	2,265,116,350
Harriman-Kuhn-Loeb	85	22,943	1,321,243,711
Morse-Leeds	9	25,032	1,059,250,933
Gould-Rockefeller	109	28,157	1,368,877,540

What do these figures mean? They mean that at least 90 per cent of all the railways—which are public highways—over which the commerce of the country is carried, are controlled by six financial boards or agencies. This, to me, looks more like one gigantic community of interests than a condition of competitive, legitimate business enterprise, about which we have heard so much from distinguished gentlemen who oppose this bill.

The truth is, railway companies have been working for years to eliminate competition, and they have about succeeded. Now that they have succeeded, and there is no more of competition among the carriers of the country, it is eminently proper that the Government take a hand in this matter.

The railway managers were quick to see that railroads are monopolies, and that competition between them differed from competition in other lines of business. The advantage of maintaining rates was seen. Hence the roads at once began to arrange among themselves to divide the traffic, which has been very effectively and equitably done. But when the roads did this, what about your competition? This consolidation of interests was called "pooling," and in the act of 1887 "pooling" was prohibited. Since that time some very famous prosecutions have been made by the Government and, I desire to say, with a reasonable degree of success.

But this table shows six boards with identical interests control practically the transportation business of the country; yet gentlemen talk about competition in the railroad business.

Not only do we find six great financial agencies in control of the railroads of the country, but we find that between the six companies there is a mutual understanding as to rates and which places the entire commerce of the country practically under one common source of control. Then need we marvel that present rates are high and constantly subject to advance and being advanced? There is but one logical conclusion at which we can arrive, and that is the railway business has become a monopoly and needs to be restrained in some of its practices. It was contended that by the consolidation of these interests expenses would be reduced; consequently better rates would follow.

It was further contended this was the only purpose of the consolidation. Was this true?

Consider what those in control of the railroads have done. By consolidation 922 lines of road (I mean different roads) and nearly 50 different systems have been merged into 6 great systems. They now reach out into every nook and corner of the United States, and, with a common interest, determine what rates shall be charged the people of the different communities for transporting their commodities. Is it to be wondered at that unjust discriminations exist? Is it to be wondered at that rebates are granted favored shippers? Is it to be wondered at that people for short hauls pay more than others do for long hauls?

Then, is it to be wondered at that President Roosevelt in his last message to Congress said, "In order to insure a healthy social and industrial life, every big corporation should be held responsible by, and be accountable to, some sovereign strong enough to control its conduct?" This declaration from the President of the United States comes well enough recommended to me to cause me to support the pending bill.

As an abstract economic proposition it might be true that increased profits in the hands of a few shippers may allow greater development than where the business is divided, but it is certainly harmful to any community in its practical application. Wealth may be more rapidly accumulated when an individual or a number of individuals get a monopoly on any business, but the thrift and prosperity of the community at large depend upon a general distribution of opportunities and accumulated wealth. These large railroad corporations have come to look upon the small shipper with a degree of contempt. In their big way of doing things and in their way of looking at big things they only look with favor upon the big shippers of the country. This is why there is such a thing as a system of secret rebates practiced and unjust discriminations made. Hence the railroad companies encourage centralization in business.

We must not forget that one of the objects set out in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States is, "To promote the general welfare." I take it this bill seeks to promote the general welfare of all our people, consequently I shall vote for it. As I said in the outset, I shall vote for this bill because it is reasonable, practical, and equitable. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, there are just one or two observations I care to make respecting the pending bill. I very much fear it will not benefit those who most need protection by law. Now, Mr. Chairman, every railroad in its very nature is a monopoly. If one road passes through a community the people of that community are forced to ship over that road or else not ship at all. If there are two or more roads serving any particular town or community we all know it is not very long before they adjust all their differences and the shipper finds the same rate given him by each and every one of the roads over which he can possibly ship his goods. It has been stated on this floor in this debate—and, so far as I know, the statement had not been challenged—that all the railroads of this country are practically owned or controlled by six corporations. Now, speaking for myself alone, I hold that wherever a shipper is forced to deal with a monopoly he should have the guaranty by law that he is being dealt with fairly; that the rate of freight he is forced to pay is fair and just and reasonable, and I hold, Mr. Chairman, that every person who ships should have that guaranty, should have that protection without being forced to go into court and ask for it. Now, you can call this what you please. You can call it "government ownership" if you want to; I do not care what you call it if it is right. As a matter of fact it is not government ownership; it is simply the enforcement of a section which you have already put in your bill. I find in the bill a paragraph which declares that all rates charged for the transportation of freight or passengers shall be just and reasonable and that all unreasonable rates shall be unlawful. Now, how can you enforce this law? It can only be enforced upon demand of the aggrieved party, who must expend a considerable sum of money in having his rights protected.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad my brilliant young friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] took the position he did in the speech he has just delivered. If we are going to pass a bill, let it be a bill that will accomplish what it is intended to accomplish. Let us not pass a bill which will protect the wealthy shipper and leave the small shipper practically without protection. Every person who ships a bale of cotton, every person who ships a bushel of wheat should have the guaranty that freight paid by him for the transportation of that bale of cotton or bushel of wheat is fair and just and reasonable, and he should not be forced to go in court to have such rate declared fair, just, and reasonable. Dealing as he is with a monopoly (and I do not use the word monopoly with any offensive intent), he should have the satisfaction of knowing that there is some agency whose duty it is to see that even justice is done between the shippers on the one side and the railroad company on the other. Gentlemen, let me inquire from whom come the most vigorous protests against the passage of this bill? Do these protests which we have all been receiving come from the large shipper or the small ones? So far as I know almost every protest against the passage of this bill comes from the great shipper. Why? Because they are the ones who have been enjoying the unlawful benefit of rebates and discriminations. The large shipper needs, it seems, but little protection. The man who needs the benefit of your bill most of all is the man whose business is so small that he can not afford to go into court, and I hold that some agency somewhere, of some kind, should be vested with the power and charged with the duty of seeing that every shipper, large and small, is fairly and justly dealt with, whether he asks for it or not. No monopoly should object to this supervision.

For the State to surrender part of its sovereignty and leave the humblest individual in the land at the mercy of the very agency to which that sovereignty is surrendered is perfectly indefensible in morals. [Applause.]

Here is a giant on the one side engaged in business with a pigmy on the other. The law should establish and preserve an equation of justice and square dealing between the two. This bill, Mr. Chairman, is very good as far as it goes. The Democratic party was demanding the enactment of such a law years ago, even before Col. Theodore Roosevelt was thought of as a Presidential possibility. I say there are good features in this bill. Let us hope they will not be eliminated when the bill goes to the President for his signature. I hazard the statement here and now that the President himself would despair of the passage of this bill but for the Democratic support which he knows he can count on and which will be practically solid. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us all hope that his influence with his own party is such that this Democratic measure adopted by a Republican President will not fail to pass. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEBBER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with close attention to the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], for I remember that in the Fifty-eighth Congress he started right and he voted right. He has told the House that he then voted for the railroad rate bill, but somewhere along the way he has seen a ghost—the ghost of railroad preferentials—and his attitude now reminds me of the story in the schoolbook of the boy who was traveling along the road at night and saw come out of the darkness what appeared to him to be an actual living ghost. In his fright he turned and ran, but as he ran he began to think over the things of his youth, and while he remembered that his grandfather and grandmother said there were ghosts he remembered, also, that his father and mother said there are no ghosts. So concluding that the grandfather and grandmother were wrong, and believing the father and mother, he plucked up courage and turned back in the direction from which he had come. When he got up to the supposed ghost, it turned out to be nothing but a great white friendly guideboard, and not only that, it was pointing just the way he wanted to go. So if the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], for whom I have the highest regard, had kept on and not been deterred by the hobgoblin story which has been poured into his ears somewhere between the Fifty-eighth and the Fifty-ninth Congress, in my humble judgment he would be with us to-day. There is also that other story that I am reminded of, which went the rounds as a cartoon, that illustrates his position, taking into account his earnest appeal to-day and his apparent troubled condition of mind. I refer to the man with the wheelbarrow that was heavily loaded with articles labeled "Cares, duties, and responsibilities of to-morrow." His back was bending in trundling the load, his face was distorted, perspiration was dripping from his forehead, but out of his pocket protruded a bundle, giving him no trouble, labeled "Cares, duties, and responsibilities of to-day." It is the hobgoblin of something that is to come that troubles some of the Members of the House who oppose this measure.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand the situation, the rights of the railway companies and the rights of the people, in brief, are these: Not one rod of the 210,000 miles of railway in this country was constructed except by laying it across private property, and to that end the property owner, even though it took from him the old home with all of its sentiment, had to surrender under the principle "the greatest good to the greatest number." But along with that right not only went the rights of the railway company to forever send its cars over the steel track, but that other great right of franchise to the great traveling and shipping public; and it is because of that franchise to the public guaranteed to every American citizen and the stranger within our gates who may desire to use these railways at all times and under all circumstances, to ship his commodity over them on equal terms with all others at a reasonable rate, that these companies had the right to lay one foot of such track. Any shift or device to evade that vested right of the great traveling and shipping public is in contravention of the Constitution. It makes no difference whether it is a contract entered into between the railroad company and a shipper or is a law passed by Congress or a finding by the Interstate Commerce Commission or an act by the legislature of a State. If it takes away that vested right in the great shipping and traveling public, it is absolutely void. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not clothed with power to lay down any new rule as to rates. That is a part of the franchises that belong to the railroad companies and the public, fixed by the common law, that the rates must be reasonable and all served alike. The Commission simply hears the evidence on complaint and follows this rule.

What is it? It is that the rate must not be discriminatory and shall be reasonable. What the Interstate Commerce Commission can do, and all that the promoters of this bill and those who have been so faithful, having it in charge, claim, is that the Commission shall hear the testimony on complaint made to see whether or not the rate is reasonable; if unreasonable, fix a maximum reasonable one; if discriminatory, correct that, and that is all. Beyond that the Interstate Commerce Commission can not go.

There are three great arteries of transportation in this country—the waterways, the dirt highways, and the steel highways. I remember reading not many years ago an interesting case reported in one of the United States Supreme Court reports. It seems that Fulton and Robertson as a company were granted a charter by the State of New York, by the terms of which they were given the right forever to navigate by steam power all the navigable streams of the State of New York against the world, and, strange as it may seem to us of this day and generation, that legislation was sustained by every intermediate court until it reached the Supreme Court of the United States, when John Marshall, that greatest of all elucidators of the Constitution, delivered an opinion that forever swept away such a doctrine, in which he stated that such a privilege is in contravention of interstate commerce and therefore could not be the law. To-day we have these great steel highways, and by reason of the character of the track we can not pass over them with our private vehicles, and so the Government has given to individuals and companies the right to construct these highways over private property by paying only its actual value to aid the public. If I read the decisions aright, that right carries but two exclusive privileges to the promoters or companies—that is, to carry over the roads passengers and the commodities of the people. They have no right under the Constitution to engage in any other business in conjunction with the roads, though it is true in many instances they are doing it in violation of law. The roads have no right to make profits in any way out of anything save and except in transporting the commodities of the public and carrying passengers over the roads. I acquiesce fully in the claim made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I believe he is absolutely right in his contention, and the agitation and legislation must go on until the railways of this country have surrendered all interest in outside enterprises. I never could figure out how any private car company has a right as against the public to send its cars over these tracks by contract with the railroad companies. I do not believe that it is either the spirit or letter of the Constitution to permit it. The spirit and letter of the Constitution is that you may send your commodity over these tracks. The company must receive your commodity; it must send it on equal and reasonable terms with everybody else; it must give all equal facilities; it has no right to say to a company or an individual owning private cars, "We will take your car or cars and for a stated amount send them with your commodities and passengers over these tracks." For all these railroad tracks on the rights of way, in the broad sense, belong to the public—absolutely to the public. And until these private infringements are gotten rid of and we come back to the constitutional rights of the people this contention will go on.

Look at the situation. A young man with ability and limited means undertakes to start in business on one of these railway tracks; if he is in the field of endeavor of those who have pooled their issues and put up a plant, he is at their mercy, for he finds them accorded rates by the railroad companies not given him. The gentleman from Maine said, in substance, if he had his way he would do away with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I was startled by the statement he made—that the wronged shipper should resort to common law for redress. I will admit that a wronged shipper has at common law a remedy, so far as the law itself is concerned, but the difficulty is in working it out. It may be fine in theory, but impracticable in practice, and it was because of that fact that this Interstate Commerce Commission was organized. No man can take his complaint of unjust rates and discrimination into a common-law court of justice and try to work the problem out under the rules of common law in these days against these corporations doing an interstate business and secure justice, and it is because men wiser than myself saw this impractical situation for the shipper that the Interstate Commerce Commission was organized. There they can at once bring their complaints to the Commission. The gentleman from Maine says, How can this Commission tell what is a just rate? He says there is no scientific rule by which it can be determined. There is no scientific rule by which it can be determined anywhere; human judgment, under the evidence and rules of common law, finally determines. Suppose the Congress were to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the name of "interstate judges." Would such legislation make them any wiser? Suppose the same evidence is brought before the common-law court. Will the judges composing such tribunal be any wiser than the men who make up the Commission? It is a man's judgment when you get through with it. You have to lodge the power somewhere, somebody has to hear the evidence. When the gentleman says, Away with the Commission and leave the people to common law, he is twenty years behind the progress of events. That was tried for years and brought no results. The process was too slow.

This bill does not contain what those most deeply interested in it—those who drafted it and the committee who reported it—would like to have in it. Like everything else in legislation, it is a compromise measure; but let us stand for the bill, and as we move along in the course of events, and more testimony is gathered, and its workings are put to the test, and we find wherein the weakness lies, more legislation can follow to remedy the mistakes. But to do away with the Interstate Commerce Commission after all the effort that has been put forth would be a sad blow to the shipper. I know there are a large number of people who wanted to have the investigations of the Interstate Commerce Commission done away with a long time ago, for they suffered the penalties of law as results of the evidence given before that Commission against them. Arrayed against this Commission is this immense capital, back of which are the trained brains of the railway men of this country. I do not understand that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] desires to have the Commission done away with; he says that he does not think the bill goes far enough. I agree with him. But the bill in its present form is in the right direction and should pass. If it can be made broader at this time, I shall be glad.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does not the gentleman think that this Congress ought to be as solicitous for persons as they are for hogs, and put the Pullman Car Company under the provisions of the bill as well as the Armour Company?

Mr. WEBBER. I most assuredly do. If I had my way about it, this bill would be broad enough and explicit enough to put every Pullman car under its ban.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is to hinder the striking out of one word, and putting the Pullman cars into the bill?

Mr. WEBBER. If the gentleman will give me a chance, I will vote for such an amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there any sacredness about a Pullman car that takes it out of the domain of regulation?

Mr. WEBBER. None whatever.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman figure it would weaken the bill to put it in there?

Mr. WEBBER. Not the slightest.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What does the gentleman suppose is the reason it is not in?

Mr. WEBBER. I do not know.

Mr. MAHON. Does not the gentleman believe that the express companies should go in?

Mr. WEBBER. The express companies should go in as well.

Mr. MAHON. They rob the people as well as the railroads, even more so.

Mr. WEBBER. In fact, any shift or device that in any way takes away from the people the rights that are given to them by the construction in the railways should be lodged in the bill. There is no question about that. Whether or not they shall be placed in there by this Congress, the time is coming when they must be placed in some rate bill. There was no particular trouble raised in this country about rates until large aggregations of capital got together. When you bring together millions and billions, and along with the millions and billions, men of trained minds to manipulate them, while the great mass of people are about their business, in the humble walks of life, the result is that wrongs are perpetrated—that men to-day, worth their thousands, sit behind closed doors and within a few days will be worth their millions, through railroad rate manipulation. There is not a man in this House who would do away with a mile of railway. We would build more. The railways in the broad sense belong to the people. If people desire to organize companies and construct these roads and make out of them a fair profit, it is all well and good; but when a man starts in as a railway lawyer, or railway director, and within the space of five or ten years becomes a man worth millions, there is something wrong going on. If the Interstate Commerce Commission, with all the powers with which it is clothed, and will be under this bill, can not correct that wrong, then let us get up a bill that will do it. And I am not an anarchist. Talk about the ghost of Populism which the gentleman from Maine ran onto, by the way! Go out into the States of Kansas and Nebraska to-day and charge a man with being a Populist, and he will thrash you on the spot. They are dead and gone; you can not find one of them. This Government is going to live in spite of unjust railroad rates. It is not going back. We are not going to be handed over to the anarchists. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to my colleague so much time as he may desire.

Mr. RIVES. Mr. Chairman, believing it to be a duty I owe to the people of my section of the country, I rise to support this bill. I support it because I believe it to be an honest measure designed to promote the general welfare of the majority of the American people, and when legislators in their effort to serve the people they represent legislate in the interest of the majority, then their duty has been discharged and one of the fundamental rules of a republican form of government has been observed, namely, the will of the majority shall be the will of the whole.

Mr. Chairman, this bill will not satisfy everybody. To satisfy everybody is an impossibility. This bill no doubt has many imperfections, but it is just as possible to provide for every contingency that might arise in the future as it is to satisfy everybody in the first instance.

A great deal has been said about the rights of the railroads in connection with this question. We hear it said but for the railroads our country would not be developed as it is to-day; that they have opened up new territory for settlement and development, and in doing this they have made great sacrifices.

This is all true to a certain extent, but we must remember that this was not accomplished by the railroads alone, but that the people who followed the railroads and inhabited these new territories, made just as many sacrifices, endured just as many hardships, and are entitled to just as much credit for the development of the country as are the railroads.

We hear it said that the interests of the railroads are great, representing millions of dollars in investment, and therefore they should not be unjustly interfered with in the management of their property. I agree with this statement unqualifiedly.

It is also true that the interests of the people of this country of ours are great, and should not be unjustly interfered with.

But, Mr. Chairman, I fear their interests and their rights have been unjustly interfered with, and the fact that this great wave of agitation is now sweeping over this fair land of ours from the Atlantic to the Pacific is very good evidence that this is true.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to unjustly interfere with any man, or any thing, and especially with a great institution that is as valuable, as necessary, and has done as much for our country as has the railroad. I do want to interfere with the man or the railroad or the common carrier or any other person who, by reason of having received certain concessions from the public, becomes a public servant, owing certain duties and obligations to the public, and continually persists in violating these duties and obligations.

A public servant of this character should not be a respecter of persons, should not grant special privileges to special persons, should not be guilty of unfair discrimination in any manner whatever. Every citizen doing business with it should pay the same reasonable charge for the service rendered.

This, as I understand it, is what the bill in the main seeks to accomplish. It seeks to compel railroads and other common carriers to deal fairly and justly with all shippers, to charge reasonable rates, and, upon their failure to do this, invests the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power to see that they do. In other words, section 4 of the bill provides as follows:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever * * * upon complaint * * * it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier * * * or that any regulation or practice whatsoever of such carrier or carriers, affecting such rates are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged, and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed.

Grave fears have been expressed on the floor of this House by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] about giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the powers this bill proposes to give; grave fears that the high type of manhood now in the Executive office will not always be selected by the people to preside over their affairs. I agree with the gentleman that it may be possible that we will not at all times be blessed with an Executive as fair and fearless as the one the people have so overwhelmingly selected at this time; but, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is a bridge we have not reached at present, and one that should be crossed when reached, and I would suggest to the gentleman that if we desire to avoid crossing such a bridge altogether, all that is necessary to do is to keep the Republicans in power. [Laughter and applause.]

I do not believe we should allow existing evils to go without adjustment because of the possibility that something uncertain might happen in the future. We might as well say that no law should exist providing for the punishment of the burglar or the robber or the murderer because of the possibility that some corrupt prosecuting officer might be elected or appointed in the future.

This objection should not be allowed to interfere with the passage of this bill.

We must trust to the honesty of men chosen as public officials, because in the majority of cases under our system of government this is the only alternative open to us.

What assurance have the people who sent the Members of this House here to represent them that they would do so in an honest manner, other than their faith in our integrity and manhood? None whatever.

I am sorry to say officials are sometimes corrupt and can not be trusted, but I believe in the majority of cases honesty prevails. If this were not true we could not maintain a republican form of government.

The gentleman from Maine says he would not like to see certain men occupy the Executive office with the power to appoint this Commission. I would not like to see the type of man he no doubt refers to hold this responsible position. But I would suggest to the gentleman that if such a catastrophe should happen the people will be responsible for it and not this Congress, and in that event they should not be heard to complain of their own folly.

Mr. Chairman, in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce last year one of the principal objections to this legislation presented by the representa tives of the railroads was to that feature giving the Commission the power to fix rates. They objected to it because they were afraid the Commission would arbitrarily fix every rate in the United States and then there would not be the flexibility that is necessary in the transaction of the business of the railroads. An attempt coming from some source was made to educate the people that this was what was being sought by the Esch-Townsend bill, and if that measure passed great calamity would befall the railroads, the railroad employees, and the people of the nation in general.

If a law giving the Commission the power to fix rates in the manner in which they thought that bill would were passed I, too, would have grave doubts as to the results; but, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe any such legislation was proposed in that bill, and I am sure it is not the intention of this bill, and if not, some new objection, of which I have not heard, will have to be advanced before I will be convinced this bill should not become a law.

If any rates are fixed by the Commission under this bill it will be the fault of the railroads and no one else, and conceding the Commission would fix an unfair rate when called upon, no person should be heard to complain of his own wrong.

Something has been said about the effect this bill will have on the railroad employees. An officer of one of their unions has said:

> The regulation of the earnings are so closely related to the expenditures that the law, if made effective, practically controls both. Anything that benefits the companies benefits the employees, so in this legislation we feel our interests are mutual.

All of this, I have no doubt, is true, and if the Commission were given the power to fix rates in the arbitrary way this officer has been led to believe it will, the employees would probably be affected, but if they are affected under the operation of this law, as I think I understand it, it will be the fault of the employer, as I have before suggested, violating the law and seeking to receive an unreasonable remuneration for his services.

I would not willingly vote for any measure that would have a tendency to reduce the wages of railroad employees or in any manner be detrimental to them. Neither would I vote for a measure I thought would be harmful to the railroads. I do not want to harm any man. I prefer to protect all men.

Section 1 of the bill defines the term "railroad" and the term "transportation," and, as I understand it, the object of the committee in doing this was to cover the use of switches, cars owned by shippers, and refrigerator cars, with the view of doing away with the evils heretofore existing in the use of these facilities of transportation.

The time is certainly at hand for legislation along this line. Recent developments have disclosed a disgraceful condition of affairs existing in the United States, especially in the use of the refrigerator and private car, and, if the reports are true, certain shippers are actually being robbed without any recourse in law. And if futher reports are true the railroads in this case are being imposed upon and are at the mercy of the people owning these private cars.

Some doubt has been expressed as to whether or not express cars are included in the definition of the term "transportation." I can only hope that they are, not that I have any special grievance against the express companies, but on the broad principle that if one is regulated all should be regulated.

Section 7 contains an all-important feature of the bill, and that is the publicity feature. It provides, among other things, for annual reports showing the amount of capital stock issued, the dividends paid, the funded and floating debts, the number of employees, the number of accidents, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, and further provides a penalty for refusing to make these reports.

If it is right to regulate the charges and other practices of common carriers, then it is right to let it be known how the business is being conducted.

We are told in the Bible that certain men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. The object of this section of the bill is to let the light shine in on the transactions of these great corporations, in order to find out whether they are to be compared with the men of biblical times.

And now, Mr. Chairman, one of the strongest reasons in favor of the merits of this bill, and the last I will mention, is the fact that all of the Members of this House, with few exceptions, are for it, Democrats as well as Republicans. The committee, consisting of twelve Republicans and six Democrats, have made a unanimous report on it, after long hearings and laborious investigation. This, to my mind, is evidence that the people have been heard from and are demanding that the great evils this bill seeks to remedy should be stopped.

Ordinarily a great deal of the time of the House is taken up in making political capital out of measures that are being considered by the House. On this occasion we are not confronted with anything of this kind, but we are confronted with the pleasing spectacle of honest servants of the people seeking to give the people the legislation they are asking for and seeking to give it to them as quickly as possible. Let us hope our efforts will not be futile and that the same prompt action will be taken in the other Chamber of the Capitol. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VREELAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12987, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report and views of the minority, ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 12612) to further promote the dairy industry of the United States.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 6, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF ARMY AND ARMY DENTAL SURGEONS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have been detained from the Senate for the last three weeks by illness, and the doctors have just let me out. Yesterday, in my absence, two bills were passed by unanimous consent, upon which I had relied on objection being made until I could be present. I will give the titles of the bills and simply ask that the votes passing them be reconsidered and that they be restored to the Calendar in order that I may have the opportunity of objecting; and that a message be sent to the House in accordance therewith. They are the bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army, and the bill (S. 2355) to regulate the corps of dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department of the Army.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine enters a motion to reconsider——

Mr. HALE. No; I do not. I ask consent that the votes be reconsidered and that the bills go to the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], who took great interest in the dental surgeons' bill, are not present. I think we could hardly grant unanimous consent in the absence of those Senators.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have the matter disposed of now.

Mr. MONEY. No one on this side could hear anything that was said by the Senator from Maine. We only understand that a motion has been made to restore a bill to the Calendar. We do not know what the bill is, nor what objection is made by the Senator from Massachusetts. We should be very glad to know.

Mr. HALE. Two bills were reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to increase the expenses of two different branches of the War Department. I am opposed to increasing the expenses of any part of the War Department, but I do not propose to argue that question now. As I was absent on account of illness and was depending upon another Senator to make objection, who did not understand that I expected it, I simply ask that the votes passing the bills be reconsidered and that they be restored to the Calendar, so that I may have the same opportunity I would have had if I had been here yesterday.

I will say further I desire very much that it should be done now, because I do not expect to remain long in the Senate today. I will say further that I do not expect to do anything about these bills except that they shall be brought to the attention of the Senate and properly discussed when they are reached upon the Calendar. But there has been no opportunity for that, and in my absence they were passed, as they certainly would not have been passed, because my single objection would have kept them on the Calendar.

I simply ask that the votes be reconsidered, and that the bills be restored to the Calendar.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Maine if he will not withhold his motion until the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] is here. The dental surgeons bill was referred to him as a special committee by the Committee on Military Affairs at two different sessions of Congress, and the Senator from Alabama is very much interested in it. After a thorough investigation he reported favorably on the bill, and I think it is only due to him, as it is due to the Senator from Maine, that he should be given an opportunity to be present in the Chamber when unanimous consent is given.

Mr. WARREN entered the Chamber.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Wyoming, who is chairman of the committee, is now here. Possibly he can speak for the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Wyoming understand the request I have made?

Mr. WARREN. I just came into the Chamber this moment.

Mr. HALE. I will state it again. I have been detained by illness, as the Senator, perhaps, knows. It is the first time I have been here. I will say for the information of the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee, that in my absence yesterday two bills increasing the expenses of two branches of the Army, to which I am opposed, were passed by unanimous consent, I depending upon a Senator to object for me, and he not understanding and not making the objection.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator to what bills he refers?

Mr. HALE. The bill covering the medical corps and the dental surgeons bill. All I ask is that the votes be reconsidered and the bills restored to the Calendar and the House notified, so that I may have the same privilege which I would have had and exercised yesterday had I been able to be present.

Mr. WARREN. As far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest objection to the course which the Senator pursues, for I am sure if the bills can not stand on their merits they ought not to be passed, and I would not be one to take any advantage, as I know the Senator will believe that no advantage was sought to be taken in his absence.

Mr. HALE. I understand that entirely.

Mr. WARREN. I would not be willing to have it even seem that we would take that advantage. So I trust the course may be pursued which the Senator suggests.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the bills have not gone to the House.

Mr. HALE. Then I simply ask unanimous consent that the votes be reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the votes by which Senate bill 1539 and Senate bill 2355 were ordered to a third reading, and passed, be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bills will be restored to the Calendar.

ACCEPTANCE OF DECORATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, requesting that Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, retired, be authorized to accept a decoration of the order "Pour le Mérite, für Wissenschaften und Kunste," conferred upon him by the German Emperor, and that the Department of State may be permitted to deliver the decoration to Professor Newcomb; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Treasury, together with the draft of a bill to provide for a fund from which payment may be made by the Secretary of the Interior for advertising the restoration to the public domain of land in forest reserves, all of the lands temporarily withdrawn for forest-reserve purposes; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants in Indian depredation claims not heretofore reported to Congress; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MOROCCAN CONFERENCE AND RELATIONS WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have already addressed the Senate at some length upon the subject of the policy and propriety of sending delegates to the Algeciras Moroccan conference. It had not been my purpose to ask again the indulgence of the Senate upon this subject or upon questions which are nearly connected therewith. It has, however, happened that in the progress of the debate upon that subject and also on the subject of the Santo Domingo treaty certain propositions have been announced on the floor of the Senate and have been very earnestly and very ably discussed by learned and distinguished Senators, magnifying the powers of the President and minimizing the powers of the Senate, to which I can not give my assent and to which I ask the further indulgence of the Senate that I may make reply.

Before proceeding, Mr. President, I desire to say that in submitting an argument to-day on this subject I will endeavor to make it impersonal, because I consider it a very grave question, involving the relative rights and prerogatives of the President of the United States and of the Senate—a question important to be settled correctly and, if possible, without reference to partisan feeling or bias. I think I may possibly with propriety repeat what I have said upon a former occasion, that there is no justification for the statement which has been more than once made upon the floor of the Senate that the discussion of this question is in any manner an assault upon the present occupant of the executive chair. Legitimate and respectful discussion, not only of the rights and prerogatives of the Executive, but of the official acts of the Executive relating to questions of such rights and prerogatives, can not in any manner be construed into a personal assault, and it occurs to me, Mr. President, that the reiteration of the suggestion—to give it no stronger term—that such discussion is an assault upon the President—and sometimes stronger terms have been used—must imply a want of confidence in their own contention by those who seek to fortify their position by such suggestion.

The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] announces, as I understand him, the following proposition: That the negotiation of a proposed treaty and every phase of the work of considering and determining what shall be the subject and terms of a treaty are, up to and including the reaching of an agreement with a foreign power and until the proposed treaty is submitted to the Senate for final ratification or rejection, matters within the sole and exclusive right and power of the President; and that the jurisdiction of the Senate does not attach in any manner, and that no power or duty or right of the Senate begins until the President shall have negotiated a proposed treaty with a foreign power, shall have agreed with the foreign power on the terms of the same, and shall have sent it to the Senate; and that for the Senate to attempt either by inquiry or suggestion to have part or lot in such work prior to the submission to the Senate, is an intrusion upon the exclusive domain and jurisdiction of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, in order that it may be seen whether I have correctly stated the position of the learned Senator, I will take the liberty of reading some extracts from his speech as it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Senator said:

> From the foundation of the Government it has been conceded in practice and in theory that the Constitution vests the power of negotiation and the various phases—and they are multifarious—of the conduct of our foreign relations exclusively in the President. And, Mr. President, he does not exercise that constitutional power, nor can he be made to do it, under the tutelage or guardianship of the Senate or of the House or of the Senate and House combined.

Further, the Senator said:

> The words "advice and consent of the Senate" are used in the Constitution with reference to the Senate's participation in the making of a treaty and are well translated by the word "ratification" popularly used in this connection. The President negotiates the treaty, to begin with. He may employ such agencies as he chooses to negotiate the proposed treaty. He may employ the ambassador, if there be one, or a minister or a chargé d'affaires, or he may use a person in private life whom he thinks by his skill or knowledge of the language or people of the country with which he is about to deal is best fitted to negotiate the treaty. He may issue to the agent chosen by him—and neither Congress nor the Senate has any concern as to whom he chooses—such instructions as seem to him wise. He may vary them from day to day. That is his concern. The Senate has no right to demand that he shall unfold to the world or to it, even in executive session, his instructions or the prospect or progress of the negotiation. I said "right." I use that word advisedly in order to illustrate what all men who have studied the subject are willing to concede—that under the Constitution the absolute power of negotiation is in the President and the means of negotiation subject wholly to his will and his judgment.
> When he shall have negotiated and sent his proposed treaty to the Senate, the jurisdiction of this body attaches and its power begins. It may advise and consent, or it may refuse. And in the exercise of this function it is as independent of the Executive as he is independent of it in the matter of negotiation.
> I do not deny the power of the Senate either in legislative session or in executive session—that is a question of propriety—to pass resolutions expressive of its opinion as to matters of foreign policy. But if it is passed by the Senate or passed by the House or passed by both Houses it is beyond any possible question purely advisory, and not in the slightest degree binding in law or conscience upon the President.

And again:

> Mr. President, I do not stop at this moment to cite authorities in support of the proposition, that so far as the conduct of our foreign relations is concerned, excluding only the Senate's participation in the making of treaties, the President has the absolute and uncontrolled and uncontrollable authority.

I have read this much, Mr. President, for the purpose of showing that I have not overstated or incorrectly stated, as I understand, the position of the learned Senator. As to whether or not he is correct in that construction of the powers of the President and the want of power in the Senate, must depend upon the language of the Constitution of the United States. Fortunately so much of the language of the Constitution as relates to that is within a very small compass; it is in one sentence. It is the second paragraph of the second section of the second article of the Constitution, and it is in these words:

> He shall have Power—
> Speaking of the President of the United States—
> He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

That is all there is in the Constitution as to the power of the President to make treaties and as to the right and power of the Senate to participate in the work of making treaties.

Now, Mr. President, it will be seen that in that language the word "negotiate" does not occur. There is no separate, express grant of power to negotiate a treaty. It is necessarily true, however, that the power to negotiate a treaty is an implied power involved in that language; in other words, the power "to make" a treaty necessarily implies the power to negotiate a treaty. But there may be a very great difference in opinion as to what is the meaning of the word "negotiate," if we assume it and concede it to be an implied power found in that language. So far as the power to suggest a treaty to a foreign power is concerned, or to receive a suggestion from a foreign power that a certain treaty should be made, or to discuss with a foreign power the subject or the terms of a proposed treaty, undoubtedly the power to negotiate within that narrow limit is one which can only be exercised by the President, because he alone under this clause can have direct communication with the foreign power. No other officer or authority on the part of the United States can submit a proposed treaty to a foreign power. No other authority can discuss with a foreign power the terms of a proposed treaty, or come to a preliminary agreement with the foreign power regarding the same. Within this restricted sense the implied power to negotiate a proposed treaty is in the President alone.

But it is evident that the learned Senator in this discussion does not confine his understanding of the word "negotiate" to such narrow limits in defining the power of the President in the making of treaties. Evidently the Senator intends to include in the exclusive power to "negotiate" a proposed treaty, the exclusive power to do everything connected with the policy or impolicy of a treaty prior to its actual submission to the Senate for its ratification. In other words, the Senator's proposition is that under this implied power to "negotiate" everything in the way of consideration of the advantage or the disadvantage, or of the propriety or the policy of making a treaty, or of its terms, is a matter for the exclusive suggestion and deliberation and determination of the President, and that any suggestion or inquiry or advice on the part of the Senate prior to such submission is gratuitous and intrusive, and, as has been suggested, even insulting to the President. The radical and extreme position of the Senator in this regard is best understood when the fact is known that his utterance above quoted is caused by the introduction of a resolution asking information concerning the instructions given to the delegates appointed to the Algeciras conference. That resolution the Senator condemns as intrusive upon the exclusive jurisdiction of the President. According to the contention of the learned Senator, alone in the brain of the President, alone in his suggestion and deliberation, and alone in his judgment must be evolved and shaped up the policies and measures which, if they become law, are to be the supreme law of the land.

According to that contention, the Senate has nothing to do with it—no concern, no right to consider, no right to be heard, no right to inquire, no right to advise—until the President shall have thus perfected it according to his judgment and submitted it to the Senate, to receive at its hands a perfunctory—often, I should say, a perfunctory—reply of "yes" or "no;" and according to that contention to proceed beyond that is an intrusion upon the exclusive domain and jurisdiction of the President.

Mr. President, that proposition is not sustained either by the letter or by the spirit of the Constitution or by the history of the treaty-making power as found in the history of the convention which framed the Constitution. On the contrary, they all, and the history as well of the adoption of this provision of the Constitution as found in the debates of the constitutional convention, combine to establish the proposition that in the making of treaties it is proper for the Senate to advise at all stages. Upon the very surface of it lies the oft-repeated suggestion that, if that were the case, the Constitution would limit itself to the term "consent."

Mr. SPOONER. Limit itself to what?

Mr. BACON. I say, if that were the correct construction, there is the oft-repeated suggestion that if it had been the intention of the framers of the Constitution to limit the action and function of the Senate solely to the power to ratify or to reject, the language of the Constitution would not have been "advise and consent," but the language would have been "consent," because there is no reason why the word "advise" should be given to add to or explain the meaning of the word "consent." We do not advise men after they have made up their minds and after they have acted; we advise men while they are considering, while they are deliberating, and before they have determined, and before they have acted.

As I have already said, Mr. President, there is no direct, express, separate grant of power to negotiate. The entire power is the power to make treaties; and yet the learned Senator would have us divide that power so that the term "to make" should be construed to mean, in the first place, in one division "to negotiate" and in another division "to conclude." But there is nothing in the words of the Constitution to justify any such division as that. It is one indivisible power "to make," and in the entire power "to make" the Senate is given full participation in advising and consenting.

The contention that the power of the President includes everything up to the time of the submission of the proposed treaty to the Senate might be sustained if the language of the Constitution were that "the President of the United States should have power to negotiate and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties." Then it would indicate a separate function; then it would indicate a first division of the duty, to negotiate, the jurisdiction of which was confided entirely and solely to the President; and the second division, to make, one in which the President and the Senate together should act.

But the language of the Constitution is, "He shall have power, by and with the consent of the Senate, to make treaties," which plainly indicates not that the Senate should be limited to saying yes or no to a perfected and finished work when presented to it by the President, but rather the assistance of the Senate, the advice and cooperation of the Senate in the determination as to the propriety and policies of proposed treaties and also the terms and provisions they should contain. But the word "negotiate" is omitted before the words "to make." That is not an accidental omission. There was design in it. Aside from the fact that there is no ground upon which to predicate the suggestion that it was an accidental omission, the words used by the framers of the Constitution in the very next clause, really only divided from it by a semicolon, prove that they were weighing carefully the language when they conferred the power upon the President of the United States. Separated from it only by a semicolon is this language—I will read the entire clause, part of which I have already read:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur;—

Then follows the semicolon. Then the language proceeds:

> and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, etc.

There it was the evidently distinct purpose to divide the duty and to confer in the first part of that division an exclusive function and jurisdiction upon the President of the United States:

> He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint.

Showing that the purpose was that up to the time it was submitted to the Senate, the Senate had no function in the matter of appointment, and that the function of the Senate was limited to advising and consenting to the nomination previously made by the President in the discharge of a function and of a jurisdiction exclusively confided to him.

Can it be said that the framers of the Constitution of the United States in writing a clause, or two parts of the same clause, were careless in the use of language when they were conferring the great power of treaty making; that they intended to say that the President should have the exclusive function up to the time of the submission of the treaty to the Senate, and that the duty and the power of the Senate, as the Senator from Wisconsin has said, should only begin when the President had so done, and that they used this language as found in the Constitution, leaving to be implied only the construction contended for; and then thereafter, in the less important matter of the appointing of officers, should have been critical in the use of language, leaving nothing to implication, and should have said "he shall nominate," and then added "and thereafter"—I interpolate the word "thereafter"—"and thereafter, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint?" Mr. President, it is incredible.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator whether he therefore concludes that the advice of the Senate is necessary from the inception of a treaty to its ratification?

Mr. BACON. I do not say it is necessary, Mr. President, because nothing is necessary which would not invalidate if it were lacking. If the Senator means by "necessary" proper and designed and contemplated, I say "yes." I think I have answered the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have listened to the Senator's argument, which is cogent and very closely knitted, with interest; but if the Senator's argument is compelling at all, it is that the difference in the language used in the two clauses means, according to the Senator, that the advice of the Senate is needed from the inception of a treaty to its ratification.

Mr. BACON. I maintain that it was the design of the framers of the Constitution. But the only thing necessary to its validity is the consent, because that makes the treaty, so far as the Senate is concerned.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me for just a moment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly. I shall not interrupt the Senator until he gets through.

Mr. BACON. But the question is as to the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution as to the functions which should be performed by the Senate. My learned and distinguished friend the Senator from Wisconsin, from whom I should differ with the utmost hesitation upon a question where there was no politics, which was simply one of law—I say that to the Senator in all kindness, for all of us are more or less so influenced by politics, and neither the Senator nor myself is free from that—the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is that the duty and function of the Senate, the right of the Senate, as stated in his language, does not attach and does not begin until the treaty is submitted to the Senate by the President.

My proposition is that according to the language of the Constitution, and as I shall endeavor a little further on to show by the history of it, the purpose and intention was that the Senate should give to the President—that he should have the right to receive and they should have the right to offer—advice and counsel from the inception of the treaty.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the Senator's argument goes to the propriety, not to the necessity of the advice of the Senate up to the time a treaty is ratified?

Mr. BACON. I think I have answered that question in showing what I considered to be the meaning of the word "necessity."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the whole discussion hinges on that.

Mr. BACON. I do not think the Senator misstates the position I occupy, as I understand him.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not intend to interrupt the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator, but, if agreeable to him, I should like to ask him one question.

Mr. BACON. With pleasure, and if I can answer it I will.

Mr. SPOONER. In reference to this language "and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors," etc., what significance does the Senator give to the word "advice" as contradistinguished from the word "consent" in that clause of the Constitution?

Mr. BACON. Well, I had anticipated that that question would be asked.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it is no surprise to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. No; it is not a surprise to me, and I confess it is a question which has caused me some trouble. I recognize that. I can only say that there is no question about the fact in my mind that the use of the word "nominate," and thereafter the use of the words "advice and consent," implies that so far as the nomination is concerned there is to be no advice and consent. I grant the Senator's contention, which I understand, of course, to be implied by his question, that there is strength in the argument that if in the case of a nomination the words "advice and consent" are used where there is no previous advice given, therefore the argument that "advice and consent," as used in the making of treaties, is not necessarily to be construed as an intention that we should advise prior to the time. I grant that; but there is this which can not be escaped, and that is, that in the clause with reference to the making of treaties there is no division——

Mr. SPOONER. There can not be.

Mr. BACON. And there can not be any; but yet the Senator makes a division.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. BACON. Or I so understand him. I understand the Senator makes a division in the one case of treaties; and the language of the Constitution makes the division in the case of appointments. It distinctly makes a division between the nomination and the submission of it to the Senate and the action of the Senate. In the other case there is but one act authorized, and that is to make treaties, and "to make" includes every part of it, from the beginning to the end; and the only possible exception, the only possible exclusion from that is in the matter of the discussion of it—the interviews, you might say, between this Government, through the President, and the foreign power. That is manifestly a matter that the President alone can perform, because he is the one authorized to make it; but in the making of the treaty, not only as to a part, but as to all, the Senate is made the complete, the unqualified, the unabridged factor in common with him in the making of it.

The making of a treaty is not simply the exchange of ratifications. The making of a treaty is the conception of it, and includes everything, from the inception of the subject-matter to the minutest details.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator's statement is correct, that from the beginning of it the Senate is by constitutional right a factor, that involves the right of the Senate to be constantly informed—does it not—first, as to whether the treaty is being negotiated, and, second, the progress of the negotiation? I might go further, but I will not. Does the Senator say that?

Mr. BACON. Let me answer one question at a time.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator say that the Senate has any such right?

Mr. BACON. No; not in the sense the Senator means it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Let me answer the question.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I used the word right——

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not see that it has a right in the sense the Senator means it, as something which can be compelled, something which would be a violation of law if withheld; but if "right" means propriety; if "right" means something in contemplation to be had whenever the circumstances may be proper and desirable that it should be had, then it is a right.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, I was not discussing for one moment a question of etiquette or a question of propriety; I was discussing the division of constitutional power. If the Senate has a right—and the Senator stated it very strongly—to participate in the negotiation of treaties, it follows of necessity that, upon proper request for information of the President as to the status of negotiations, he has no constitutional power rightfully to refuse to respond; and yet the Senator will not for one moment contend that it is not entirely permissible for the President to decline to send to the Senate any information upon the subject, will he?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we must discuss these questions with reference not to what antagonistic people would do where one man was opposing another. I am speaking of the President and the Senate——

Mr. SPOONER. Upon this question of power.

Mr. BACON. It is a little more than a question of power; it is a question of propriety; it is a question of what was contemplated and designed in the law; it is not a question as to what the Senator talked about—of power, physical power. We have no means of absolutely compelling the President to do it.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will permit me to answer the question.

Mr. SPOONER. I will not interrupt the Senator again——

Mr. BACON. I do not object to interruptions, if the Senator, when he has asked a question, will permit me to answer it. The Senator says he is not talking about etiquette, that he is not talking about the matter of propriety, and yet I respectfully submit that the language of the Senator as used before raised a question of propriety. The Senator takes the position that the Senate has no right in the matter; that it has no jurisdiction up to the time that the President sends the Senate a treaty, and that for the Senate to make an inquiry or to attempt in any manner to influence the act of the President is an intrusion upon him. That is the language of the Senator. I will not read it again. I have already read it, and it is in the RECORD.

The Senator goes on thereafter and speaks of a case where the command is, according to his view, properly given to the Senate, in the foreign affairs, to "hands off." The Senator is speaking of propriety. It is of the utmost impropriety if their duty does not begin, but I am going to come to a little more detailed statement as to what I conceive to be the exact relationship and reciprocal duty of these parties, and see whether, according to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, and according to what was said by the great men who framed it, at the time they framed it, and according to the uniform and well-recognized practice of this Government for a hundred years, it has been recognized as a propriety, or whether it is an impropriety and an intrusion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Speaking, then, of the question of propriety, to which the discussion is reduced, I ask——

Mr. BACON. It is not reduced to that. Go ahead, though.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought the Senator had reduced it to that.

Mr. BACON. Go on.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator this question: Does the Senator think it would be within the proprieties, confining it to that alone, not discussing the question of power, for the Senate, under the Senator's construction of the word "advice," to send a resolution to the President advising the President to negotiate a treaty?

Mr. BACON. I will come to that direct point, though I will now say to the Senator, yes, before I get to it in order. But I will come to that, and that is directly in the line of what I have been discussing, if the Senator will permit me to approach it at the proper time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall not——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Indiana, as I have already stated that I shall discuss it in order, will let me get to it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask this question: Would the President be bound in any wise to respond to a resolution to negotiate such a treaty?

Mr. BACON. Certainly not, any more than we are bound to ratify a treaty that he negotiates.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is a mere matter of politeness.

Mr. BACON. It is a good deal more than a mere matter of politeness, and I think I will show it before I get through, if I am permitted to have the opportunity.

Now, Mr. President, I have dwelt upon that part of the subject a little longer than I otherwise would have done in endeavoring to meet the inquiries which had been propounded to me by Senators. I have endeavored to show that according to the language of the Constitution the function of the Senate, whether it is in each actively employed or not, properly begins with the inception of a treaty; that the law makes the Senate the adviser of the President in the making of a treaty through all its stages, not that it requires that in every instance the President shall have the advice and counsel of the Senate, but that in every instance the President has the right to have it, and, correspondingly, in every instance the Senate has the right to offer it. That is what I mean. If the Senator from Indiana construes that as mere acts of politeness, I will take that as a definition of it.

That is the relation. It is the right of the President to have; it is the right of the Senate to offer. It is no intrusion upon the right of the Senate, before the submission of a treaty and before it is asked whether or not it will ratify it, for the President to ask the advice of Senators, either collectively or individually, and it is no intrusion on the part of the Senate to ask of the President information with reference to any treaty he proposes to make and to advise as to the policy or impolicy of making it. That is the proposition which I make, and it involves a little more than politeness.

Ordinarily in the making of treaties it is not needful that the rule of constitutional law for which I contend should be invoked in practice. And when invoked there will doubtless be occasions when by reason of the delicacy of a diplomatic situation, the President will reply that he does not consider it compatible with the public interest to give to the Senate information as may be requested—a suggestion of which fact by the President, is always courteously acquiesced in by the Senate. But the reciprocal right and duty nevertheless exist, and in grave emergencies they should be exercised, and the effort to thus exercise them is not properly met by the denial of their existence. Much less is there warrant for resenting as an intrusion, the attempt to exercise such right and duty either by suggestion or inquiry on the part of the Senate.

Mr. President, what is the history of this matter? I hold in my hand the Madison Papers, written by Mr. Madison, taken down by him during the convention and given to the public by him later, in which there is a detailed account of the entire proceedings of the convention, with a statement of every motion that was made, every paper that was submitted, and a summary of everything that was said by every member of the convention. I now want to state this fact: That convention was in session about four months. From the beginning of it to the end of it, until near the close of that convention, the consensus of opinion of all of the delegates to that convention was that the Senate should be clothed with the entire and exclusive right and power to make treaties, and there was never a draft of a constitution submitted to the convention that did not have in it the express, unqualified provision that the Senate, and the Senate alone, should make treaties.

Now, what I have said needs this partial qualification: We all know that Mr. Hamilton was a great advocate of central power, and Mr. Hamilton, so far as I have been able to find in an examination of this book, was the only one up to the latter part of the convention—about which I will speak more definitely a little later on—who even suggested that a provision for the participation of the President in the making of treaties should be incorporated in the Constitution; and even when Mr. Hamilton suggested it, saying at the time that he would not offer it, he suggested it as something which the President should do upon "the advice and with the approbation of the Senate." Those are his words. If the Constitution had that language in it now, there would be no question; there could possibly be none, it seems to me, because the advice there evidently contemplated, preceded the act of approval.

This was the first suggestion in the convention, that the President should participate in the making of treaties; and it is instructive to note well the phraseology, especially when coming from Hamilton, indicating clearly as they do that the advice was not to be limited to the time and the act of ratification. And when this was finally incorporated in the Constitution the intended meaning was doubtless the same, although the phraseology is different. But my main purpose in citing this fact is to cite the only instance until near the close of the convention in which it was even suggested that the President should participate in the making of treaties. And from the beginning to the end of the convention it was never once suggested by anyone that the President should exercise that power alone.

Mr. Charles Pinckney submitted to the convention a complete draft of a proposed constitution, and it was the basis of what ultimately was adopted as the Constitution. In that draft Article VII was in these words:

> The Senate shall have the sole and exclusive power—
> Omitting parts which relate to other matters—
> to make treaties.

That was in May, and so it ran on until the latter part of the convention before there was ever any change made or suggested.

All the various provisions proposed were debated, and finally it was committed to a committee on detail, the purpose of which was to have a committee of learned and prominent men to shape up all the various provisions of the Constitution which had been proposed and substantially agreed upon, and when the committee on detail, after all this long discussion, reported to the convention the proposed Constitution, it had in it this language:

> ART. IX, sec. 1. The Senate of the United States shall have power to make treaties.

No participation by the President; and in the discussion of it as it went along, finally Mr. Madison made this suggestion. The language as found in the book which I am about to quote being somewhat peculiar, if this book had been written by some one else, and it had represented in it that Mr. Madison had used this language, it might have been thought that possibly he did not use these exact words, or did not mean what those words implied, but Mr. Madison, as it happens, is the author of the book and was also the man who made the motion, and here is what he said in making the motion. It was on the discussion of the article I have just read:

> Article IX, section 1, being resumed, to wit: "The Senate of the United States shall have power to make treaties"—

That was then under consideration, the provision being as it had been intended by the convention from the beginning—

> Mr. Madison observed that the Senate represented States alone, and that for these as well as other obvious reasons it was proper that the President should be an agent in treaties.

And it was upon Mr. Madison's motion, based upon the proposition that the President should be an agent in treaties, that the present provision in the Constitution was incorporated in it. Not only so, Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, an agent in what particular?

Mr. BACON. I am not attaching any special weight to the word "agent," except to show that it could not have been contemplated in the use of the word "agent" that he was to be the whole thing.

Mr. SPOONER. He was a joint maker, made so by the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. Yes. But up to that time he had not been.

Mr. SPOONER. No; but in what particular did the Constitution intend the President should be a participant?

Mr. BACON. Just in the particular that the Constitution says.

Mr. SPOONER. Well——

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator left the Chamber and did not hear what I said previously.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I heard it.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I was tracing the history of this in the convention, where throughout the purpose was to confide this power solely in the Senate, and while finally, after the committee on detail had reported and the convention had taken up the Constitution, which they had reported, section by section, when they came to section 9, which provided that the Senate should have the sole power to make treaties, Mr. Madison says that, as the Senators were the representatives of the States, for that and for other reasons, the President should be an agent in treaties.

The convention then went on and made the provision which gives him full participation with the Senate in the making of treaties, and I am not detracting from that power in any particular. I am simply denying that the purpose was to give him any superior authority in the making of treaties over the authority which was conferred upon the Senate. To each it gave a separate function, and the exercise by each of that function was necessary to the making of treaties. There was no division of the making of treaties into two parts, the decision of every material part and parcel by one, with only the power to say yes or no by the other. They were equal in function and dignity.

The Senator from Wisconsin in his argument said that the President was supreme—he used the word "supreme"—in the making of treaties to the extent that even after a treaty was submitted to the Senate and ratified by the Senate, the President could put it in his pocket and not promulgate it or exchange ratifications.

No doubt that is true, and in the same way when the President sends a proposed treaty to the Senate, the Senate, if it sees proper to do so, can treat it without any attention whatever and not even refer it to a committee. It would not be seemly to do so, but no more so than for a President to be likewise heedless and regardless of the views of the Senate in reference to the propriety or the policy of making a proposed treaty in a matter touching vitally the interests and the institutions of the country. It would be not less unseemly for him to reply to an inquiry or suggestion of the Senate, "Hands off."

In what particular is the power of the President thus to put a treaty ratified by the Senate in his pocket more supreme than the power of the Senate to bury in its archives without action a proposed treaty sent to it by the President? I am not detracting from the President or his power; I concede to him his full constitutional power; but I deny the proposition that the President has any superior power or any superior dignity in the making of a treaty over and above the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Suppose the Constitution had been silent upon the question of the treaty-making power, where would that power have lodged? Or I will put the question in this way: Suppose the Constitution had said nothing about making treaties, would not the complete power of making treaties have been in the President, under section 1 of Article II, which lodges the executive power in the President?

Mr. BACON. I think not. I do not understand the word "executive" to mean anything of the kind.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not the Senator think that in the natural division of the powers of Government into legislative, executive, and judicial the treaty-making power has always been considered an executive function, and, therefore, if the Constitution had been silent upon the subject of treaties, it would have been completely under the President's control, under that provision of the Constitution which confides in the President the executive power, and that that section concerning treaties is merely a limitation upon that universal power?

Mr. BACON. Oh, no. The Senator has gone to his favorite doctrine as to extraconstitutional power, which I will not stop to discuss with him to-day. The two continents, separated by the Atlantic Ocean, are not wider apart than the Senator and I upon the subject of the exercise of powers not found in the Constitution.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BACON. I can not discuss it to-day. It would take all my time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator to answer this question: Since the Constitution has said nothing about——

Mr. BACON. The Senator has asked that question, and he does not let me answer before repeating it. The Senator will pardon me, but he has already asked it twice.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask this question: If the Constitution had said nothing about the treaty-making power, where would the treaty-making power have been lodged?

Mr. BACON. I have received that question from the Senator several times. I have said that I did not agree with him that it would be with the Executive.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Where would it be?

Mr. BACON. I think, undoubtedly, in the legislative branch of the Government, for reasons which I will give.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the whole question.

Mr. BACON. Here is where the sovereignty of the Government was intended to be in almost its totality—in the legislative branch of the Government, and the vast array of powers in the first article of the Constitution prove it; and, further than that, the Constitution of the United States was intended to take the place of and to supersede the Articles of Confederation, under which articles the power to make treaties did lodge in Congress alone; and it was not to be presumed when the Constitution was formed, in the absence of some special and particular designation, that it was the intention to confer it upon the Executive. The presumption would be the other way.

I was about to say, however, at the time of the interrogatory propounded to me by the learned Senator, in concluding what I had to say on the history of this matter, that President Washington in one of his messages casts a very strong light upon the question as to what was the estimate which this convention had of the treaty-making power and of the duty and function which the Senate should exercise in the treaty-making power. In a famous message, which the Senator from Wisconsin cited and which has been cited frequently and with which we are all familiar, where President Washington refused to send certain papers to the House of Representatives upon its demand, upon the ground that the House of Representatives had nothing to do with treaties, and that the Senate alone was the body with which he was to deal, the Senate alone was the body which had the right to ask of him information, the Senate alone was the body which had the right to share with him the secrets connected with foreign affairs, stated this fact:

It is found in his message. He said not only was the treaty-making power confided in part to the Senate, but, speaking as he did and as he said, as a member of the convention and familiar with what had been done and said there, he added that there was a very strong effort made not only to require that two-thirds of the Senate present should agree to a treaty, but that two-thirds of the entire Senate, whether present or not, should be required before a treaty could be put into effect. There could scarcely be stronger evidence than is found in this historical fact of the supreme estimate which was placed by the convention of the importance that the Senate should be the controlling influence in determining whether or not any given treaties should be made with foreign countries.

Mr. President, we have often had cited the fact that Washington during his Administration met personally with the Senate to advise as to the making of treaties. He had been present during all the deliberations of that Convention; he was president of the Convention which made the Constitution; he had heard all the deliberations; he had doubtless in personal interviews canvassed this matter and discussed it with members of the Convention, and the fact that he met personally with the Senate, the fact that he conferred personally with the Senate as to the propriety of making treaties before attempting to negotiate them, show what he understood to be the intention of the Convention—that the Senate should be not simply the body to say yes or no to the President when he proposed a treaty, but that the Senate should be the adviser of the President whether he should attempt to negotiate a treaty. What possible doubt can there be under such circumstances as to what was his understanding of the purpose and intention of those who framed the Constitution? And what possible doubt can there be that his understanding was correct?

Mr. President, it is true that that practice has been abandoned, so far as concerns the President coming in person to sit in a chair on the right of the presiding officer to confer with members of the Senate, as our rules still provide he shall do should he come here personally, showing we recognize the propriety of his coming and his right to come. But nevertheless during my official term it has been the practice of Presidents and Secretaries of State to confer with Senators as to the propriety of negotiating or attempting to negotiate a treaty.

I know in my own experience that it was the frequent practice of Secretary Hay, not simply after a proposed treaty had been negotiated, but before he had ever conferred with the representatives of the foreign power, to seek to have conferences with Senators to know what they thought of such and such a proposition; and, if the subject-matter was a proper matter for negotiation, what Senators thought as to certain provisions; and he advised with them as to what provisions should be incorporated.

I recollect two treaties in particular. One is the general arbitration treaty. I do not know whether he conferred with all Senators, but I think he did. I think he conferred with every Senator in this Chamber, either in writing or in person, as to the general arbitration treaty. He certainly conferred with me.

Mr. SPOONER. Who did?

Mr. BACON. Mr. Hay. He certainly conferred with me, not only once but several times, and I presume he did the same with other Senators, not simply as to the question whether a treaty should be negotiated, but as to what provisions should be incorporated in it. I am sorry to say that while agreeing with the purpose in view I could not agree with some of the provisions incorporated in that particular treaty, and he went on and the treaty was formulated with which in all particulars I did not agree. But I am simply speaking of the fact that he conferred with Senators before he formulated a treaty, not simply before the President sent it here, not simply before it was negotiated with Sir Mortimer Durand and the ambassadors of other countries, but before it had been formulated

Then, as to another, I recollect distinctly the Alaskan treaty. Time after time and time after time Mr. Hay, then Secretary of State, conferred with Senators, and, I presume, with all the Senators, as to the propriety of endeavoring to make that treaty and as to the various provisions which should be incorporated in it, recognizing the delicacy of the situation, and the provisions of that treaty were well understood by members of the Senate and approved by members of the Senate before it was ever formulated and submitted to Sir Michael Herbert.

But what was Mr. Hay doing in all that time? Was he carrying out the contemplation of the Constitution? Was he engaged in the performance of a high duty? Was he availing himself of a valuable instrumentality, or was he simply engaged in the interchange of politeness?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator conceive of no distinction between consultation by the Secretary of State, if he so wills it, with Senators, and the participation of the Senate as a body, the thing of which we are speaking, as a part of the negotiating power?

Mr. BACON. The Senator leads me to remark what I said to a Senator yesterday, that the Senator's mind necessarily works more rapidly than another man's tongue can. The Senator is simply anticipating what I was coming to on that point.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a high tribute to my intelligence.

Mr. BACON. On the contrary, I consider it a tribute to me, that the logical sequence of the question is directly where the Senator put it, and that I had been so fortunate as to be going straight in that direction. So I can take it as a compliment to myself.

I will, however, now take the subject which I was about to discuss otherwise, just in the form in which the Senator puts it, because it is practically the same as that which I had intended.

The Senator asked me this question: Do I draw no distinction between the voluntary action of the Secretary of State endeavoring to get the opinion of the Senator or of myself and the act of the Senate seeking—I do not know whether I am correctly quoting him; if not, the Senator can correct me—to proffer to the State Department or to the President advice unasked? Is that the question?

Mr. SPOONER. Well, yes; substantially——

Mr. BACON. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. SPOONER. Although I want the Senator to understand that I have not questioned the right of the Senate——

Mr. BACON. I know; but the Senator asked me a question. Let us discuss that afterwards.

Mr. SPOONER. To offer its advice, either in public or in private.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. SPOONER. The question I put to the Senator was this: If he did not recognize a distinction, from the standpoint of the matter of constitutional power, between the President—leave out the Secretary of State—asking individual Senators their judgment as to a proposed treaty, and his inviting the Senate as a body, or individual Senators volunteering to the President their advice as to a proposed negotiation, and the action of the body as a body volunteering their advice, especially if they asserted the right to do so?

Mr. BACON. Well, I will answer the Senator definitely. I do not recognize the distinction, and I will tell him the reason why.

When the President or the Secretary of State either—say, the President, to simplify it—asks a Senator what he thinks about the proposition to negotiate such and such a treaty, and what he thinks as to the specific terms to be incorporated in that treaty, he does not ask that Senator that question as he asks Mr. Jones or Mr. Smith, whom he happens to meet upon the Avenue, in order that he may have the advantage of advice and assistance from a man in whose intellectual processes and capacity he has confidence, but he asks him because of the fact that the Constitution of the United States makes the Senator his adviser, his constitutional, official adviser and counselor in the making of treaties.

Now, Mr. President, if that is true, is that advice something which the President has exclusively within his control? Is it something which he can ask, and which he alone can get the benefit of in case he does ask, or is it a great constitutional provision which makes it a reciprocal right for a common benefit?

Can it be said that while it is proper for Senators or the Senate to respond when advice is asked, it is improper, under the constitutional provision, to volunteer such advice? It is undoubtedly true that the President alone determines whether he will approve and act upon the advice of the Senate, just as the Senate determines whether it will or will not approve a proposed treaty. But can it be contended that the Senate, although the constitutional adviser of the President, can only give advice when asked for it, and that it is an intrusion to proffer it when thus not asked for it? Where is the warrant in the Constitution for such contention? That it has not been so recognized by the President or by the Senate is shown by the fact that it has frequently happened that resolutions have frequently been passed by the Senate informing the President that the Senate would approve a treaty for a given purpose. Can it be said that while proper to thus notify the President, in advance, of what the Senate would approve in a treaty, it is improper to notify him also, in advance, of what it deprecates, if it is proposed to embody it in a treaty? Can it be proper for the Senate to offer advice or counsel to the President as to the policy or impolicy of a proposed treaty, and at the same time improper to ask for the information upon which to base such advice or counsel? Where is the logic of such a contention?

Again, can it be proper to advise the President as to the desirability and policy of negotiating a treaty where he has not taken any action relative thereto and where the suggestion originates with the Senate, and on the other hand be improper to advise him of the undesirability and impolicy, in the opinion of the Senate, in a case where it is reliably learned through other sources that he has begun to take or has taken action relative thereto? Where does the Senate get power to amend a treaty if its authority is limited to consenting to what the President has done? When the Senate has amended a proposed treaty and the President thereafter submits the amendment to the foreign power for its consideration, has not the Senate taken part in the negotiation of that treaty?

If the contention is correct that the jurisdiction and power of the Senate do not begin until the proposed treaty is sent to the Senate, then none of these things are proper, and to make an inquiry of the President relative to a proposed treaty is an intrusion upon his exclusive jurisdiction. If the contention is correct, it matters not what may be the well-understood purpose of an Executive in negotiating a treaty or in sending delegates to a conference, the Senate is dumb until it receives a proposed treaty. It may be, as forcefully suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] a few days ago, that the proceeding tends inevitably to war, and yet it will be an intrusion for the Senate to even make an inquiry of the Executive concerning the same.

Again, the Executive may, without ever sending any proposed treaty to the Senate, continue to send delegates to European international political conferences, and in time practically destroy our recognition of the long-established doctrine of nonentanglement by us in such disputes. After having taken an active part by our delegates in the Algeciras conference, no proposed treaty may be submitted to the Senate. Nor is that all in sight. We are told in the press dispatches that European questions concerning the Balkan States are again becoming acute; that there is great tension, and that another European war cloud is gathering in the East. Doubtless there will be another conference to deal with that situation and determine the relative rights and powers of the war lords of Europe. To that, according to the new doctrine, it will again be in order to send delegates from the United States. And after having taken an active part in the deliberations of the conference, again no proposed treaty may be sent to the Senate. And although in attending each of these conferences by our delegates tremendous strides will have been taken in establishing precedents and in destroying the doctrine of an hundred years against entanglements in European international disputes, still in the absence of any proposed treaty submitted, the Senate must be dumb, and it is an intrusion to even make an inquiry of the President in the interest of the preservation of the cherished policies of our country. Mr. President, I can not subscribe to such a doctrine.

It seems to be somewhat remarkable that there should be such extreme sensitiveness about the Senate assuming to advise as to the "negotiation" of a treaty, when it seems to be entirely proper for "advice" to be given by the President to Senators as to how they should vote on the question of the ratification of a treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, does he think if the President asked a Senator's advice as to whether a treaty should be negotiated or not, the Senator is under any constitutional duty to give it, or would be committing a breach of Senatorial duty if he declined to advise in advance?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator declined?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator declined. The Senator speaks of reciprocal rights. He says the President has the right to ask a Senator for his advice as to whether any foreign policy shall or shall not be pursued in the matter of negotiating a treaty. To test that, does the Senator think if the President has a right to ask it——

Mr. BACON. Ask the question now.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator, I should think, ought to have a reciprocal duty to answer.

Mr. BACON. I think so, undoubtedly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think the Senator is obliged to answer?

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly he may not be able to give it. He may say, "I have not the information; I have not made up my mind." But for the Senator to say, "I have an opinion, but I will not give it to you," would, in my opinion, be a contravention of his constitutional duty. There is but one possible ground upon which a Senator could base any such refusal, and that is, if he were to say (and I do not think he would be correct in that), "I recognize that this is an act which should be performed by the Senate as an organized body and not by myself in my official individual capacity, and therefore I decline to give any individual opinion." That is the only ground upon which he could put it, and I do not think that would be a correct ground.

Mr. SPOONER. Would it not be an eminently proper and wise ground for the Senator to take that the people were entitled to his independent judgment on the question as to whether a treaty should be ratified or not by the Senate after it had been negotiated and submitted to the Senate?

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator to please repeat his question.

Mr. SPOONER. Would it not be entirely proper and wise and almost a duty for a Senator to say, "I decline to commit myself as a Senator in advance to a proposed treaty. I prefer to wait until the power of negotiation, which the Constitution lodges in the President, shall have been put forth and the Senate is in possession of the instrument, so that I can read it, study it, have the advantage of debate upon it among my associates, and then give to it the independent judgment to which the people are entitled from every Senator?"

I doubt myself, and I have had some experience, the wisdom of a Senator committing himself blindly to a foreign policy, to end in the negotiation of a treaty, to find himself later, when the negotiation is ended and the document is laid before the Senate, halfway (which with an honorable man means a great way) committed, and committed too early and too hastily.

Mr. BACON. The Senator asks me a question and proceeds to argue it.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BACON. No, the Senator need not do that, and he knows it. But I said that for a purpose. I was so much interested in the Senator's argument, I am not sure that I have his question exactly formulated in my mind, and therefore I ask the Senator to repeat it.

Mr. SPOONER. My question was as to whether if the President asks a Senator his advice as to a negotiation——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will just give me the question.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator consider it the constitutional duty of a Senator to give advice?

Mr. BACON. Is that the Senator's question?

Mr. SPOONER. That was the question.

Mr. BACON. I answer unhesitatingly in the affirmative.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will pardon me. The Senator from Wisconsin asked me a question and he then argued it. He has asked it again, and I am trying to reply to it. I shall with the greatest of pleasure yield to the Senator afterwards, but I hope he will permit me to answer the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Senator asks me the abstract question whether or not I consider it to be the constitutional duty of a Senator to give advice to the President as to the propriety of the making of a treaty before it has been sent to the Senate. I answer in the affirmative. The Senator goes on to say that no Senator ought to give blindly his advice. I quite agree with him, as I have intimated before. A Senator may decline to give the advice upon the ground that he has not had the proper time for making up his mind satisfactorily to himself, or for other good reason.

But, Mr. President, advice means also counsel. Advice means more than giving simply the statement of what the Senator thinks ought to be done. It means counsel; and, therefore, while the Senator might say to the President, "I am not in a position to make up my mind definitely as to what ought to be done," the President would then proceed to counsel with him and suggest such and such a condition of affairs and such and such remedies which might be applied, with a view to arriving at a conclusion as to what would be the proper thing to do. Then, I say if the Senator would turn his back on the President and say, "I decline to counsel with you or to hear your suggestion or to confer with you as to what is the proper thing to be done," while, of course, it would be a matter of conscience for each Senator, from my point of view the Senator would be derelict in so doing. Now I will hear the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has gone by what he was talking about when I rose a moment ago.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FORAKER. But what I had in mind to ask him I can ask now, if he is courteous enough to yield. The Senator was speaking of the individual responsibility of Senators. I understood him to say that each individual Senator, if called upon by the President for his advice with respect to a treaty he was negotiating, was under a constitutional obligation and duty to respond and give to the President his advice. I wanted to ask the Senator whether or not he thought, that being the case, it would be a good excuse for a Senator to answer that he had opinions which, under other circumstances, he might be willing to give him the benefit of, but he was bound by the order of the party caucus not to advise him on that subject.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not know of anyone who is in a better position to propound that inquiry or to answer it than the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. Why so, may I ask?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not want to be too personal, and I will not say "the Senator from Ohio." I will take that back. But I do say there are Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are in an admirable position to propound and answer that inquiry, for to my certain knowledge, for reasons which are satisfactory to them and persuasions which are sufficiently forceful, they would be in exactly the same position when the President asked advice of them, because under such persuasions and such forceful influences they have—some of them, not all of them—given their adhesion to measures of which they did not personally approve.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator will allow me to say that during all my service here I have never been bound by the action of my party in caucus, because it has never held a caucus. We have conferences, in which we exchange our views, but no man is bound by the action of a conference. I have been in conferences and then I have gone out and differed on the floor of the Senate from what a majority of the Senators attending the conference saw fit to agree upon.

Mr. BACON. In some few instances, that is a fact.

Mr. FORAKER. So far as treaties are concerned, there has never been a caucus during all my service here until last Saturday by either party, so far as I am aware.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, I am not going to anticipate what is going to be a very interesting performance to-morrow, if we are correctly informed, and I would dislike extremely, by any suggestion of mine or by being led away into the very attractive field to which the Senator invites me, to deprive the expectant public of what is to be given them to-morrow.

I will simply say this, however, in response to the Senator, and then I hope we may pretermit until to-morrow the further consideration of these very interesting developments. I believe it to be strictly true, as the Senator says, that the Republican Senators have never had a binding conference or a binding caucus, but I believe it is equally true that they have never had one simply because they have that which is very much more persuasive, very much more constraining, very much more binding, very much more coercive than the order of a caucus. Now, what that persuasive and constraining and coercive influence is I will wait until to-morrow for somebody to tell the honorable Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. Is it on the same line? If it is on that line it would be better to wait until to-morrow.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. BACON. I want to resume my argument.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Upon the subject of treaties, did either party ever take any action of any kind as a party?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, if Senators on that side of the Chamber, or any of them, are led by any other reason than their own judgment to support a treaty; if any of these persuasive and binding and coercive influences to which I have thus somewhat occultly alluded have induced Senators to vote otherwise than their judgment would dictate, then, by suggestion at least, they fall under the condemnation of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to ask the Senator if he would not——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will reserve his ammunition until to-morrow.

Mr. FORAKER. If he would not excuse me from the application of the rule he has just been propounding?

Mr. BACON. I will, as a matter of friendship. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. Will you not do so in view of the record?

Mr. BACON. No, Mr. President; not now. I am going to hasten on. This is all very pleasant, and I would do the best I could—I do not know how good that might be—to meet the suggestions and pleasantries of the honorable Senators on the other side, but for the fact that I feel it due to those who are to be the star performers to-morrow that nothing should be now anticipated by me on that line.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, I am not certain whether I had fully answered the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] or not. He is present, and if I have not I hope he will call my attention to it. My attention has been so diverted I am really not certain whether I completely replied to his interrogatory. But before leaving it I wish to say in a general way that according to my view of the treaty-making power, of the duty of the President, and of the duty of the Senate, it is a reciprocal and a common duty, one in which each has the advantage of the services of the other, one in which there is, perhaps, no compulsion, one in which each can defeat the work of the other, one in which the cooperation and combination of the two from the inception to the end is necessary in order to fully comply with the intention and design of the Constitution makers in this regard.

The Senator from Wisconsin, in order to accentuate and emphasize the fact that the President of the United States sat away up on a pedestal above us in all matters which related to treaty making, except the simple matter, as he himself expressed it, of "ratification," because he translates the words "advice and consent" as meaning in the common parlance "ratification," the Senator, I say, in order to emphasize that fact, goes further, and in the clauses of his speech which I have already read he puts up as the supreme power, the supreme controller in all foreign affairs, the President of the United States. The President, according to the Senator from Wisconsin, in all of our foreign affairs is supreme. And, Mr. President, he lays down the proposition with much emphasis, and says that that is—I am not quoting the words now, but the substance—practically conceded by every man who has ever studied the Constitution. He asserts this so broadly and so emphatically that for one to assert the contrary is to recognize in advance that in so doing he, according to the Senator, puts himself out of the pale and class of reputable lawyers. Yet, Mr. President, at the risk of being thus debarred, I want to analyze a little bit the powers conferred by the Constitution with reference to foreign affairs, and see whether they rest with the President alone or whether, in the main, they rest with Congress, and with the Senate in conjunction with the President.

It is true, Mr. President, that in the countries antedating our Government the executive, who was almost universally a king—I believe little Switzerland was the only exception at that time, and I am not sure that it was at that time, because it has had varying fortunes, and I have forgotten whether at that particular time it was a republic or not—but almost universally the executive of a nation was a king, and he did have, among other kingly powers, all control over foreign affairs. But, Mr. President, when our Constitution came to be framed there was particularly and definitely withheld from the executive every important foreign function, according to my view of it. I know in one particular the Senator differs from me, but in all others he will agree. It took away from the Executive, with the exception of the treaty-making power, all power over foreign affairs. It made him, in the language the Senator used the other day, the organ of intercommunication with foreign nations. It made him the spokesman for the Government. It made him the person to discuss with foreign governments, to make demands, if you please, on foreign governments, to guard so far as watchfulness goes, the interest of our country and of our citizens in foreign lands. But when it came to action, when it came to the power to do anything, that power was expressly conferred upon Congress, or upon the President in conjunction with the Senate.

What is the most important of all foreign relations? Why, the most important of all foreign relations is the relation of peace and war. Can the President declare war? Can the President prevent a declaration of war? The President not only can not declare war, and it is not only conferred in terms upon Congress, but even if the President should be opposed to a proposed war, two-thirds of each Branch can declare war. It would not require his approval. There is the most important of all foreign relations. It does not belong to the President. Nor can the President alone make peace. He can only do so with the cooperation of the Senate.

The question of commerce is certainly an important matter of relation between two countries, and yet the President has no power over commerce with foreign nations. The power to regulate commerce is not simply withheld from the President, but it is expressly conferred upon Congress; and the subsidiary question as to what shall be the terms upon which the merchandise of a foreign country shall come to this country is a question largely important in foreign relations, and is one over which the President of the United States has no power. It belongs, under the Constitution, to the lawmaking power; and that lawmaking power can be exercised by Congress not only without the consent of the President, but over his objection.

The terms upon which foreign ships shall be allowed to enter our ports or do business with us is an important one in our foreign relations, but the power to fix and determine them is altogether with Congress.

The question as to whether or not citizens of another country shall be allowed to come to this country, and if so, upon what terms, is an important question of foreign relations; and yet the President has no power to control it. It is a question exclusively within the lawmaking power. The question whether this country will permit any of a certain nationality to come at all to this country is a question not with the President, but a question with the lawmaking power.

Nay, sir, the question whether this Government will hold any relations with a foreign country is a question with Congress. It is entirely within the competency of Congress to pass a law that no citizen of a given country shall come to this country, that no goods shall be received from it, that no merchandise shall go from this country to it, that no letters shall come from it, that there shall be no intercommunication of any kind whatever. Who doubts the power of Congress to do so?

In other words, it is within the power of Congress to absolutely sunder the relations between this country and any given foreign country. When that is said the whole thing is said; when that is said the whole argument is exhausted as to where rests the supreme power in foreign affairs, because the whole must include every part. If it is within the power of Congress to absolutely sunder all relations of every kind, commercial, social, political, diplomatic, and of every other nature, it is certainly within the power of Congress to regulate and control every question subsidiary to that and included within it. Congress and not the President is supreme under the Constitution in the control of our foreign affairs.

Now, Mr. President, there is but one question about which there is even any controversy as to the power of the President over foreign relations, and that is the one about which the Senator and myself have differed for years, and about which I presume we will continue to differ. It is as to the right of the President of the United States to finally recognize or finally refuse to recognize the independence of a revolutionary or rebellious country.

Of course, time does not permit me now to discuss that question at length. I have heretofore discussed it in the Senate, and while I am not very fond of labor, if the time shall ever come when that question is per se discussed, I shall endeavor to take my part in it, for it is a most interesting and important question. It is a matter to me of the strongest and most absolute conviction as a legal proposition. Of course, I do not question at all that where it is a question as to what is the de facto government in a fully independent country, that is a question which is practically determined by the President of the United States in the recognition of diplomatic relations, but where a country is in a condition of rebellion, which has asserted its independence and is endeavoring to establish its independence, and where the parent country is denying its independence and is by the force of arms endeavoring to put down the rebellion or the insurrection, to say that the President of the United States solely and alone can determine finally that question for this country, and that Congress has no power over it, is a matter to me absolutely without the domain of logic. I say in every act of that kind, the supreme power, the final power of decision, is with Congress, the lawmaking power, and whatever is done by the executive department in that regard is necessarily subject to the revision and control and reversal of the lawmaking power.

Why, Mr. President, we have seen in the papers that a province of Russia some month or two ago rebelled and set up an independent government, or, rather, professed to do so. We have heard nothing of it lately. I presume it has been suppressed. Suppose in a case of that kind, not this President, but any President, had taken upon himself to say, "I recognize that province as an independent government." To claim that that would have been a final, conclusive act on the part of the Government of the United States, and that Congress would in such case have no right or power to reverse the decision and save the country from war with Russia, is something to me, I say, beyond the possibility of comprehension. But I will not go into that argument now, because I know I would necessarily enter upon a field which in itself would be larger really, or as large, as the main one upon which I am now engaged in this discussion.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Constitution gives to the President the power to receive ambassadors and ministers. Does the Senator think that the action of the President in the exercise of that function is subject to the control of Congress?

Mr. BACON. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that Congress, in such a case as I have just mentioned, could pass a law and send that ambassador back to the country from which he came.

Mr. SPOONER. What sort of a law would that be? I am not talking now about declaring war or severing diplomatic relations.

Mr. BACON. It can be done that way.

Mr. SPOONER. What sort of an act would be that instruction to the President to send the ambassador back?

Mr. BACON. I do not suppose that the President would need any instruction more than the law.

Mr. SPOONER. But what law?

Mr. BACON. The act——

Mr. SPOONER. What form of law?

Mr. BACON. The act which should be passed by Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. What would be the form of such a law in a general way?

Mr. BACON. Simply to say we would not have an ambassador at all from that country, because we did not recognize it as an independent country. That is the act of Congress I have in mind when I say it would control the President and reverse his decision recognizing that province as an independent nation.

Now, as to whether or not Congress should say to the President of the United States, You must not receive John Jones, or William Smith, or any other particular man from any particular country. Of course nobody contends Congress could do that. That is not the question at all. It is the question whether in the case where a country, or part of a country in rebellion to the mother country sets up a professed or pretended independent government and sends an ambassador to this country, the reception by the President of the United States of that ambassador is a conclusive and final determination on the part of the Government of the United States that henceforth there shall be no question but what that is an independent country so far as the recognition of this country is concerned. My reply to the Senator is that if such an ambassador were sent, Congress would have it within its power to pass a law that it would not recognize that country as an independent country, and that it would continue as in the past to recognize it as a part of Russia, for instance, and when that law was passed it would be the duty of the President to give that ambassador his passports and no longer recognize him or any other as an ambassador from that pretended government.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. In the event that the President receives the ambassador or minister and Congress takes no action to rescind the action taken by the President or to contradict it, would not that ambassador be an ambassador from that country to the United States?

Mr. BACON. I think so, undoubtedly.

Mr. MALLORY. In every sense of the word?

Mr. BACON. I think so, undoubtedly.

Mr. MALLORY. Then until Congress does take action it is conclusive.

Mr. BACON. I think it is upon all other departments of the Government. It has been so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. I have no question about that whatever. I am speaking about the ultimate power, the ultimate control, and that alone.

The fact that Congress can for any reason that is deemed by it sufficient, absolutely sunder and destroy all relations, including relations diplomatic, commercial, and all others, with any other country or government, old or young, is a complete demonstration of the power of Congress to reverse any decision and action that the President might take in recognizing as an independent nation a part of a country still engaged in a struggle to secure its independence from the government to which it had theretofore been in allegiance or subjection. What logical escape there can be from the conclusiveness of that proposition I can not see. The recognition of the independence of a people, with all of the consequences which may flow from such recognition, is necessarily an act of the highest sovereignty. Mr. Seward, when Secretary of State, and when that question was a most vital one to the United States, used this language in a letter addressed to Mr. Adams, then minister to England:

> To recognize the independence of a new state, and so favor, possibly determine, its admission into the family of nations, is the highest possible exercise of sovereign power, because it affects in every case the welfare of two nations and often the peace of the world.

The prerogative to determine upon the exercise of this highest possible sovereign power belongs properly and necessarily to that authority in the State which in its constitutional functions most fully represents its sovereignty. That authority in this Government is the law-making power. The Government in its entirety is the sovereignty. But the Constitution has invested Congress with almost all of the prerogatives of that sovereignty.

To my mind it is inconceivable that upon the claim of an implied power in the Constitution there can be vested the contention that this "highest possible exercise of sovereign power" has been reposed in the President alone and finally, when the same Constitution requires the approval of the Senate before he can appoint to a foreign country an ambassador or even a consul.

It is not pretended that there is any express grant of power in the Constitution to the President to recognize the independence of a new nation. It is claimed that this final and conclusive power is given to him by implication in a single line of the Constitution. That line is as follows:

> He shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers.

Now, let me read for the benefit of my distinguished and learned friend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] something that Mr. Hamilton said on that subject. The Senator will of course remember that at the time the Constitution of the United States was under consideration by the various States as to whether or not they should adopt it, Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Madison wrote a number of letters advocating the adoption of the Constitution, and Mr. Hamilton, in one of his letters—the letter numbered 69—said this:

> The President is also to be authorized to receive ambassadors and other public ministers. This, though it has been a rich theme of declamation, is more a matter of dignity than of authority. It is a circumstance which will be without consequence in the administration of the Government; and it was far more convenient that it should be arranged in this manner than that there should be a necessity of convening the legislature, or one of its branches, upon every arrival of a foreign minister, though it were merely to take the place of a departed predecessor.

There was no man from whom that could come with more force than from Mr. Hamilton, because he was the great advocate of the concentration of power in the hands of the Executive. He even wanted the President to have the power to appoint the governors of the States. It is true that later Mr. Hamilton reversed his position and announced the doctrine that the power given to the President to receive ambassadors, etc., implied the power to recognize the independence of a new nation; and to that utterance by him Mr. Madison made and published a reply in No. 3 of his letters, signed Helvidius, of which the following is a part:

> Had it been foretold in the year 1788, when this work (the Federalist) was published, that before the end of the year 1793 a writer, assuming the merit of being a friend of the Constitution, would appear and gravely maintain that this function, which was to be without consequence in the administration of the Government, might have the consequence of deciding on the validity of revolutions in favor of liberty, "of putting the United States in a condition to become an associate in war"—nay, of laying the Legislature under an obligation of declaring war"—what would have been thought and said of so visionary a prophet? The moderate opponent of the Constitution would probably have disowned his extravagance. By the advocates of the Constitution his prediction must have been treated as an experiment on public credulity, dictated either by a deliberate intention to deceive or by the overflowings of a zeal too intemperate to be ingenuous.

But this question as to the right of the President to finally determine the question of the independence of a new nation is only incidental to the real question I am endeavoring to discuss to-day, and I can not discuss it fully in this connection, inviting as it is. I have discussed it at length heretofore in the Senate, as the Senator knows. I am now speaking as to the power of the President over our foreign affairs, and I am endeavoring to show that there is not a single important function, a single important power, saving only the pardoning power, that has been given by the Constitution to the President of the United States to be exercised by him alone, unless this implied power for which the Senator from Wisconsin contends is amongst them; and that as to all others, they have been withheld from the President of the United States and have been expressly conferred upon Congress, or upon the President in conjunction with the Senate.

If we concede the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin that the recognition of the independence of a State is a power, the ultimate exercise and the highest exercise of which is in the President of the United States, it is no answer, even with that one exception, to the general proposition that the President of the United States has no such great power, so supreme and exclusive a power and control over foreign affairs, as to illustrate and emphasize the proposition that he has similar power, such supreme and uncontrolled and uncontrollable power in the making of treaties as that when the Senate of the United States makes an inquiry as to what is proposed to be done in regard to a treaty, the reply could be given, in the language of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the President of the United States exercises his power in the matter of treaties, under neither "the tutelage nor the guardianship of the Senate."

Mr. President, not only in the matter of foreign affairs, but in all other matters, in all other powers, the design of the makers of the Constitution was that there should be no supreme and royal powers in the President of the United States. The fight out of which they had just emerged was to rid themselves of one-man power, and when they came to frame the Constitution they did not intend to confer any absolute power upon any one man. The only reason that they provided for a President at all was that in the nature of things somebody to execute the law was deemed to be necessary.

In all the enumeration of the powers of the President, he has the appointment of officers and the making, in conjunction with the Senate, of treaties. Outside of that substantially his whole power is embraced in one half line—"he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." There is his great office, and that is what the Constitution intended should be his great function. "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Outside of that, Mr. President, his power is a bagatelle. Outside of that, and the treaty-making power, and the appointing power, it is a bagatelle. He is, as stated by the Senator in his speech, the organ of communication with foreign governments; but his great function, that which gives dignity and power to his office, is that he is to execute the laws.

But the Constitution has invested Congress with almost all the prerogatives of sovereignty. The broad, unlimited, and exclusive grant of all legislative powers under the Constitution, without more, carries with it the larger and most important part of the powers of sovereignty. But the enumeration in the Constitution of the powers of Congress goes further, conferring upon it, among others, the powers—

To lay and collect taxes.
To provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.
To regulate commerce with foreign nations.
To coin money and regulate the value thereof.
To define and punish offenses against the law of nations.
To declare war.
To raise and support armies.
To provide and maintain a navy.
To suppress insurrections and repel invasions.

Each of these, besides others of which I have omitted to make mention, is a distinct power of sovereignty—the powers which kings with sovereign power personally wield; and in addition thereto after enumerating these most sovereign powers, there is the following comprehensive grant of power to Congress:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

By this not only is Congress clothed generally with all power of legislation necessary to carry into effect all the powers granted to Congress, but Congress is further and exclusively vested with the power to make any and all laws necessary and proper for the execution of any of the powers of the Government of the United States and of any Department of the Government, including both the executive and judicial departments. Mr. President, when to these great powers is joined the power to impeach and remove from office any officer of the Government, from the President to the lowest civil officer, little could be added to completely invest Congress with every attribute of the sovereignty of the Government.

Compared to this great array of sovereign powers granted to Congress, those conferred upon the President present a most striking contrast. He is clothed with the great power and responsibility of the execution of the laws, but beyond this the only prerogative of sovereignty with which he is exclusively invested is the pardoning power, and even that is denied to him in cases of impeachment by the House and conviction by the Senate.

We have passed by more than two hundred years the period in the history of our race when one man could assume and exercise the power to determine, independently of the legislative department, what should be, even in part, the laws of the Government. The framers of the Constitution stood nearer by a hundred years than we do to the time when a King sought to rule without Parliament and in defiance of Parliament; when he sought to take to himself all the powers of government and set at naught the laws of the country's constitutional legislators. The great and wise men who framed our fundamental law stood in the century next removed from that which had witnessed the culmination of that great struggle from the events of which they gathered the lesson that the material interests and the liberties of a people are safest when the great powers of government are lodged not in the control of one man, of whatever title or office, but in the hands of their elected representatives.

They had learned from it that one man invested with such powers was quick to consider his own fortunes and the fortunes of his favorites of more consequence than the prosperity of the whole people. They were taught by that history to fear that one so girt with power would grow great in his own conceit; that he would attempt to draw to himself all the authority of Government, and that not only one born to the kingly office, but also one who held but temporarily the elective office of President, might come to think himself compassed with—

The divinity that doth hedge a king.

While they hoped that only good and wise men would be chosen to that high office, they forgot not the frailties of the weak nor the grasping ambitions of the strong. They guarded against the worst. They designed that in the hands of a weak Executive the Government should not fail, and that in the hands of one strong, self-willed, and ambitious there should not be imperiled the free institutions which they sought to establish. Therefore, while they created a great and noble office, one within its legitimate sphere the greatest and noblest of all the earth, they designed that its greatness and nobility should not consist in the arbitrary powers of the kingly office.

The greatness of the Presidential office does not consist in his will being the law to 80,000,000 people, but in the fact that the President in himself personifies the will of a great and free people as that will is expressed by them through another department of the Government. No man can shut his eyes to the fact that to that end, while they invested the President with all the great dignity and power of the Executive office, they carefully withheld from him the grant of the powers of sovereignty. Every power given to him was most carefully restricted and guarded.

While they gave him the power of the veto, they gave the Congress the power to override his veto by a two-thirds vote of each House.

While they gave him the power to make treaties with foreign nations, by and with the advice of the Senate, they refused to him the power to make such treaties without their sanction.

They gave him power to pardon those convicted of crime, but denied to him the power to pardon in cases of impeachment.

They gave him the power to appoint all civil officers, but except temporarily, when Congress is not in session, such appointments are of no validity until confirmed by the Senate.

They made him Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but they left it to Congress to determine what should be the size and constitution of the Army and Navy, and whether there should be any Army and Navy. They denied him the power to appoint a single officer of either the Army or the Navy, from the commanding officers to the lowest subalterns, unless each of such appointments should receive the confirmation of the Senate. They gave him no power to equip and maintain either Army or Navy for a day. They gave him no power to make war, nor can he of himself conclude peace. The power to make rules for the government and regulation of the Army and Navy is denied to him and is expressly conferred upon Congress. It is evident that as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy he is but the Executive arm, and that in that capacity he is himself, in every detail and particular, subject to the commands of the lawmaking power.

Finally, they made the Chief Executive, as well as every other civil officer, from the head of the Cabinet to the most obscure civil official, subject to trial and removal from office, without appeal, upon impeachment by the House and conviction by the Senate—a power, in much conservatism and wisdom, but seldom exercised, but nevertheless a power, resting as it does, without defined limits as to what shall be deemed a high crime or misdemeanor, almost exclusively in the discretion of the House and Senate, which is the great safeguard against encroachment and official misconduct.

Mr. President, the fact is not to be disguised that the actual exercise of power by the executive branch of the Government in this day far exceeds the bounds originally contemplated for it by the Constitution. The correspondence in relative position of a president in a republic, and of a king in a monarchy; the glamour of a great office in which one man among 80,000,000 is chosen as the sole head of a great department of the Government, while in the other departments the honors are divided among many; the gigantic measure of patronage and removal, where he seems to have unlimited power to bestow, or to withhold, or to take away—these and other influences combine to elevate in the popular mind the prerogatives of the President far above the point designed for them in the Constitution.

It is a remarkable fact that in England, a monarchy, the constant progress has been toward restraint of executive power and the enlargement of the power of the legislative branch of the Government, until now practically all political power is in the control of the elected representatives of the people. It is a fact still more remarkable that in the United States, designed distinctively as a representative republic, there has been a no less steady progress in the direction of the absorption of power by the Executive and of its practical surrender by Congress.

Mr. President, Senators are concerned and solicitous about the alleged encroachment of the legislative branch, or of the Senate in its executive capacity, upon the powers of the Executive; but it seems to me there is very much more reason why they should be concerned about the invasion by the executive department of the power conferred in the very first sentence of the Constitution of the United States. What is that first sentence, found in Article I, section 1?

All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him right there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. I will yield; but I want to comment upon what I have just read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is merely to call the attention of the Senator to the first section of Article 2 of the Constitution, which says that—

The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

Mr. BACON. Who doubts that?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Nobody doubts it; but the Senator is arguing against it.

Mr. BACON. No; I am not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said the President had no other power than a limited treaty-making power and the power to see that the laws were faithfully executed.

Mr. BACON. I consider that latter an executive power.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly it is one of the executive powers; but does the Senator say it is all of the executive power?

Mr. BACON. I say that is the generic meaning of the word "executive." The Senator has diverted me from what I was saying. I want to go back. I will say to the honorable Senator that, when I have finished, if he desires to revert to that branch of the argument, I will return to it with pleasure, provided the Senate has the patience and can be induced to listen to it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I regret that I diverted the Senator. I merely wanted to place immediately parallel with his statement about the legislative powers being vested in Congress, which nobody denies, the statement that the executive power is vested in the President of the United States, which nobody denies; and that "executive" powers include the power to make treaties, so that anything said in the Constitution about the making of treaties is not so much the conferring of power as the limitation of power. If nothing had been said about treaties in the Constitution the power to make them, absolute and unlimited, would have been in the President under the grant to him of "executive" powers, would it not?

Mr. BACON. I will not stop to discuss that matter now. I confess that I can not see the pertinency of the Senator's suggestion. If he will permit me to proceed I will simply say to him that the word "executive" comes from the verb "to execute," and it means one who is to execute the laws of the government. He is an executive officer and not a legislative officer. I have just read this section of the Constitution, and I read it again after the interruption in order that it may be in proper connection.

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Is that the law to-day? It is the law on the book, but who will say that the legislative power of this Government is exercised in the two branches of Congress? Who does not know that the most influential part of the legislative power of the Government is at the other end of the Avenue—in the White House? I am not speaking only of the present occupant, although I think he is doing his full share of it; but it has been so in all Administrations in greater or less degree within a generation. The Executive has encroached continuously upon the legislative branch of the Government, and it has never been more pronounced in its encroachment than it is to-day.

Why, the time was when one who desired legislation by Congress came to Congress, and with proper or improper means, if you please—certainly with proper means—endeavored to influence Congress in the enactment of certain legislation. How is it to-day? Who is it that wants legislation who comes to the House of Representatives or to the Senate? We see every day in the newspapers accounts of pilgrimages to the White House for the purpose of securing legislation; we see every day in the newspapers forecasts as to whether or not such and such legislation will be passed or can not be passed, according as it may be announced that it will receive the support or the active opposition of the Executive. Absolutely, Mr. President, I saw within the past few days an explanation given that the stock market had gone or up or down—I have forgotten which—in consequence of the announcement of the position of the Executive as to a proposed piece of legislation which would affect prices. And I have seen statements in the papers that Members of Congress had gone to the White House to solicit the aid of the President to secure the passage of certain desired legislation. More's the pity!

Well, Mr. President, as I say, it is not only this President, nor the last one, nor the one before, but it has been going on and increasing for more than a generation. It is better that Senators and Representatives should concern themselves about the question as to whether or not their own prerogatives and rights and powers are being encroached upon rather than be supersensitive as to whether or not in the assertion of our own powers we may be overstepping the mark. Of course, we ought not to transgress the limits set to our powers by Constitution, not by a hair's breadth, but our particular and special duty is to preserve and protect against encroachment our own rights and our own powers in this matter.

Mr. President, the time will come, if this thing continues and increases, when the question of the attitude of Senators and Representatives with reference to any proposed legislation will not be an important matter, and when it will be well understood that such and such legislation is to be enacted or defeated, as the case may be, regardless of the personal views of Senators and Representatives. When that time comes members of each House will cease to discuss measures, because of the absolute uselessness of it. Only "Administration measures" will be enacted, and none others will be attempted from very hopelessness.

Mr. President, I recall an incident in my own experience. I once visited a country which was nominally a republic, and, being interested in legislative matters, I frequently visited the hall of the assemblage, which corresponds to our House of Representatives. While I was not familiar with the language of the country to any great extent, I had sufficient knowledge of it to be able to tell a negative from an affirmative vote, and possibly a little more than that.

Day after day I visited that assemblage, and in no single day did I ever see a member rise and hear him address the Chair, and in no single instance did I ever hear a member of that assemblage cast a vote in the negative on a bill which was before it. The votes on bills were always taken by the yeas and nays, so that I could tell how each member voted. Every member present had his name called, and every one of them, in every instance, answered "yes" in the vote on a bill. After I had been there several days and had daily witnessed this performance, the members seeming absolutely dumb, nobody being heard except the presiding officer and the clerk who read the bills, and no sound being heard from a member except to say "yes" to every bill, my curiosity was excited. Not being able to understand the bills as they were read, I stopped at the door as the house adjourned—they generally sat about an hour, passed without a negative vote all the bills that were read to them, and were dismissed and went home—I stopped at the door, and as he came out I addressed a member who looked to me as if he might speak English. Fortunately it did prove to be so.

I narrated what I have said here and told him that it excited my surprise and my curiosity; that I was very much interested in legislative affairs, and that I could not understand how that body—a large body, too; certainly over 100 men—could sit there day after day, with no man ever addressing the Chair, and no man ever saying a word, except in private to one of his colleagues, and no man ever voting in the negative. He rather hesitated in his reply, and I said, "For instance, to-day I saw passed two bills which were read by the clerk and the roll was called, and in each instance every man answered 'yes,' just as to every other bill I have seen put to that house for passage there was the answer 'yes' by every member." "Yes," said he. "Why was it," I said, "that there was no debate, and why was it there were no negative votes?" Said he, "There was nothing to debate about; they were simply appropriation bills which the President had written and sent to us, and there was nothing for us to debate about or to do but to pass them. There was no reason why we should discuss them or why we should any of us vote 'no' upon them."

So, Mr. President, if things continue to progress, it may happen—I think, though, it will be a long time before it does, because our disposition is different from theirs, and such subjection and such servility it is impossible to conceive will ever come to the American people—but in practical result it will be so that the question of what this Congress shall do in any important matter will be a question not decided by their own judgment or the judgment of a majority, but decided by other influences. It is largely so now. More and more the idea will be that, excepting "Administration measures," the only business of Congress is to pass appropriation bills and then disperse. It is notorious right now that most important subjects of legislation, such, for instance, as the revision of the tariff, are receiving no attention, and the question whether Congress will or will not legislate on them depends solely on whether they will or will not be made "Administration measures." That is openly and undisguisedly now recognized in the case of the question of the revision of the tariff.

There can be no condition more dangerous to the maintenance of free government than is found in the concentration in the hands of one man at the same time of both the executive power and practically the power to make the laws he is to execute. Whatever may be the form of government, when these two powers are thus concentrated in the hands of one man the government where that condition exists is an autocracy pure and simple. It makes no difference in practical effect whether that one man himself decrees the laws or whether they are enacted in obedience to his dictation.

Mr. President, I did intend to have something to say about the Algeciras conference and possibly about Santo Domingo, but I have occupied so much time I will not do so, except to call attention to a matter which was the subject of a very short colloquy between the learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and myself when he was on the floor discussing the Santo Domingo treaty. The Senator will remember that when he was speaking of the condition of Santo Domingo being such as to warrant and to require our interference I asked him whether or not, in his judgment, if similar conditions should exist in other countries bordering on the Caribbean Sea, it would be likewise the duty of the United States Government to interfere for the purpose of collecting their revenues and settling their indebtedness, with a view, perhaps, to prevent the forcible interference of other countries. The Senator from Massachusetts was rather reluctant to reply categorically, and said that he did not think that such conditions would arise.

I want to read something, Mr. President, to indicate to the Senator and to the public whether or not there are now such conditions in the Central American countries and in the countries bordering on the Caribbean Sea as will bring us again face to face with the same conditions and require of us—if duty now requires of us—again to take the same action with reference to them that it is now proposed to take with reference to Santo Domingo. I have here, Mr. President, a part of the January number of the Monthly Review, an English publication, from which I will read a short extract. Speaking of these Central American and South American states, with reference to their financial condition, this article says:

> Anything like a historical survey of the numerous conversions, unifications, consolidations, and more especially reductions, to which the external debts of the minor Latin-American republics have been subjected could not fail to weary the reader. But it may be of interest to state that the foreign debt of Colombia has been in existence for eighty-three years, during approximately forty-seven of which no interest was paid; the corresponding figures for Guatemala, Honduras, and Venezuela being, respectively, seventy-eight and forty-eight, seventy-eight and seventy-two, and eighty-three and forty-one.

That is, the debt of Guatemala has existed seventy-eight years, in forty-eight of which no interest has been paid; the debt of Honduras has existed seventy-eight years, in seventy-two of which no interest has been paid; and the debt of Venezuela has existed eighty-three years, in forty-one of which no interest has been paid.

> Costa Rica and Nicaragua have benefited by intervals during which they owed nothing to the foreign bondholder. Nevertheless the external debt of the first has been in default for some thirty years out of the forty-seven which represent its total existence, whilst Nicaragua paid nothing for forty-nine years out of sixty-six.

Again, in the same publication——

Mr. MALLORY. What is the paper?

Mr. BACON. It is the Monthly Review.

Mr. MALLORY. For what month?

Mr. BACON. It is for the past January.

> Moreover, there are various reasons for thinking that even in the best-disposed of these Republics the outlook is by no means promising. Two or three illustrations will suffice to justify this assertion. The Nicaraguan debt is small, but owing to the depreciation of her currency every pound sterling she pays abroad represents about $25 of the local money instead of $5. Some two years ago Colombia issued from a protracted civil war, which, if the number of privates killed was in any degree proportionate to that of the generals, colonels, etc., who fell, must have decimated the population. She has since lost Panama, while the expenses of the war were met by the shortsighted expedient of issuing forced currency. As a result she now finds herself saddled with a debt in notes reaching the enormous total of nearly $850,000,000.
> At one time the rate of exchange for the paper dollar touched 25,000 per cent; but by legislative enactment the parity between gold and paper was fixed not long ago, in respect of Government transactions, at the relatively moderate figure of 10,000 per cent. Even this means that Colombia's dollar represents only 2d. of our money, and the brain whirls at the thought of the equivalent in currency of the £81,000 which she will in future have to pay each year for the service of her foreign debt.

The article I am now about to read is from the Washington Post of June 24, 1905, in which is given an extract from the South American Journal, of London. It says:

> The South American Journal, of London, in its issue of June 3, voices the joy of the British bondholders in the deal recently consummated between Costa Rica and Messrs. Speyer & Co., in which the Government of the United States is made a party. It says—

Now it quotes from the South American Journal—

> "Fluctuating between 20 as the highest and 17½ as the lowest, and opening this year at 28, Costa Rica 'A' bonds have this week advanced to 58½, much of this improvement having taken place quite recently. Costa Rica has been in default so long that bondholders are to be congratulated on a deal which gives such a high value to their bonds, for which they are greatly indebted to Messrs. Speyer. Of course, this great American firm are not philanthropists, and it is believed that behind them they have at least the moral support of the United States Government.
> "Several clauses in the agreement would seem to point to this, for it would appear that the new loan is to be specially secured upon the Republic's customs receipts, which are to be collected through a customs agency to be designated by Messrs. Speyer, but should default take place then designations may be made by the President of the United States, who, in another clause, also has the right to request Costa Rica to submit any disputes or questions arising to arbitration."
> The London publication adds this most significant sentence:
> "It is believed that Messrs. Speyer have other Central American defaulting states in hand."
> Nearly all the bonds of the Central American republics have felt the stimulus of the new Monroe doctrine. The South American Journal prints a list showing the highest prices during 1904 and the latest quotations, revealing a marvelous improvement, and strongly supporting the report that "Messrs. Speyer have other Central American defaulting states in hand."

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I presume is informed in regard to these matters. I desire to ask him whether or not he is cognizant of any arrangement by which this Government could properly be called a party to this Speyer agreement?

Mr. BACON. I am not; but I would say this to the Senator——

Mr. TILLMAN. But is the Senator aware that anybody is authorized to deny it?

Mr. BACON. Well, I think I am.

Mr. TILLMAN. In what way would the Senator put it?

Mr. BACON. I will proceed to tell the Senator. I deny that anybody has the right to bind the United States in that way.

Mr. TILLMAN. "In that way;" but I want to know whether anybody has tried—whether we have had another Sanchez-Dillingham protocol down there.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has asked a question and I would ask him to please let me reply, and then I will submit to another with very great pleasure, because the Senator always asks very interesting questions.

There is no reason to believe that there has been any authorization for any such arrangement, at least any authorization which itself had behind it any authority of law; but this fact is true, that this arrangement is in substance practically the same arrangement as that which some creditors of Santo Domingo made with Santo Domingo and which was carried out by the award of certain arbitrators who were named, which award has been sent to the Senate by the President of the United States in a message as a basis for his action in the Santo Domingo matter; in other words, just such an arrangement as has been made by Speyer & Co. with Costa Rica was made between the Santo Domingo Improvement Company and the Government of Santo Domingo, and the effort to carry that agreement out is really the basis of the proposed treaty between the United States and Santo Domingo.

That agreement provided that in case of default in payment by Santo Domingo the customs duties should be corralled and certain officers should be nominated by the President of the United States and should go into office for the purpose of collecting the revenues of Santo Domingo and paying them over in extinguishment of this debt. Under that arrangement there was an agreement as to the amount of the debt, and an arbitration as to the way in which the agreement should be carried out, and the officers were named, and before the proposed Santo Domingo treaty was ever promulgated the officers were put in charge of the custom-houses in the Dominican Government and were engaged in the collection of revenue.

It was under that arrangement, it was at that time——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BACON. In a moment I will, with pleasure. It was at that time, if I understand it correctly, while these officers were thus engaged in the collection of the revenues of Santo Domingo under an agreement between the Santo Domingo Improvement Company and Santo Domingo itself—precisely like this Costa Rican arrangement—that the proposed treaty with Santo Domingo was sent to the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Georgia has not answered my question. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I wanted to know whether the Senator from Georgia was authorized to state or could state whether or not there is now somewhere lying around in the State Department another Sanchez-Dillingham protocol with Costa Rica?

Mr. BACON. I have no such information. I never had——

Mr. TILLMAN. Yet the Senator says that the Costa Rican condition is on all fours with the Santo Domingo condition.

Mr. BACON. Not at present. I said——

Mr. TILLMAN. You mean it is just ripening. It has not gotten to the point where the Executive is willing to commit the Government, by his own authority and will, without any consultation with the Senate on the subject.

Mr. BACON. I will let my euphemistic friend make his own statement in regard to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to get light, if there is any light lying around.

Mr. BACON. I have not got it, at present, at least, on that subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. Maybe the Senator from Massachusetts has it. He seems to be well posted.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that he let me conclude, and then he can ask the question of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TILLMAN. We do not want to drag this thing in by the head and ears after the Senator is all through. I should like to get that information from anybody who is willing to offer it—whether or not Costa Rica is in a similar condition or situation, or likely to get into it, that Santo Domingo was before the treaty was negotiated.

Mr. LODGE. I know nothing about Costa Rica, but I will merely observe that the Senator does not seem to see any better after he gets light.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the Senator's opinion, perhaps. There might be difference of view, according to the man who is talking or listening.

Mr. LODGE. I do not expect the Senator from South Carolina to agree with me.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course not.

Mr. BACON. I simply have read these statements relative to Central and South American countries in pursuance of the colloquy which the Senator from Massachusetts had a few days ago, in which, when the Senator was speaking upon the Santo Domingo conditions as calling for intervention and action by this Government as it is proposed in this treaty, I asked him the question, as stated by me a moment ago, whether, in his opinion, if like conditions arose or presented themselves in the countries bordering on the Caribbean Sea, a like obligation and like duty would be imposed upon this Government as to them.

The Senator from Massachusetts replied that he did not think that a like condition would arise or be presented. I have read this for the purpose of endeavoring to show to him and to the country that like conditions are not only liable to arise, but at present exist, and that when we enter upon this process we will not only ingraft upon this Government this ulcerous sore, this pestiferous cancer of Santo Domingo, for all time, but we shall have entered upon a career where like conditions and like duties and like sacrifices and like calamities are to again befall us.

It is a salutary practice for the President to be advised by the Senate whether there should or should not be an attempt to make a treaty. There are Senators who have been here for a generation and whose advice and counsel would be valuable to any President, however learned and able and patriotic he might be. An election to the Presidency does not ipso facto endow one with all knowledge and all wisdom, and it is not an unreasonable suggestion that in the aggregate of ninety Senators, many of them men of large experience, there is more of knowledge of public affairs, more of correct judgment of the requirements of the public interests than is possessed by any one man in the United States, whoever he may be.

Mr. President, what stronger illustration could be made of the advantage, of the good policy, of having the President of the United States confer with Senators before entering upon treaties than is found in the present situation? If the President of the United States had conferred with the Senators of this body before he took any step with reference to Santo Domingo, if he had conferred with an open mind for the purpose of getting advice and not for the purpose of directing the views of others, is there any man who believes that one-half of the Senate would have advised him to undertake that enterprise? Does any man believe that half the Republican side of the Senate would have advised him to undertake the enterprise? It illustrates the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. President, that is not all. It would have been greatly to the advantage of this country if the President of the United States had been advised by the Senate, as some of us endeavored to advise him, as to the settlement of difficulties with Colombia; and I can conceive of no reason why to-day the suggestion of arbitration is not made to the French Government of the difficulties with Venezuela, it being known that France is consulting the executive department of this Government with reference to what it shall do in Venezuela. I can conceive of no reason why, under the obligations imposed by The Hague treaty, committing us thoroughly not only to the principle of arbitration, but to the principle of offering between two parties the suggestion of arbitration, this Government does not suggest arbitration to France in its dealing with Venezuela, except that our mouths are closed by the fact that we would not arbitrate ourselves with Colombia.

I recognized the position which some Senators took when the question was before us, that there were questions between this Government and Colombia which the self-pride and honor of this Government did not permit to be submitted to arbitration. For instance, the claim of Colombia that this Government had instigated or aided the insurrection in Panama. But there are questions which did not fall within that category. We had a treaty with Colombia, formerly made with Grenada and inherited by Colombia, in which we guaranteed to that Government the sovereignty of the Panama peninsula; and whether it is right or wrong, the claim was made by Colombia that we had violated that provision of the treaty. The question of the violation of a treaty is one distinctively within the contemplation of The Hague tribunal, one distinctively within the ordinary scope of courts of arbitration. When we refused to arbitrate that question and the additional question whether or not by the presence of our troops and of our ships we prevented Colombia from herself putting down the insurrection,

I can understand why our mouths are now closed, so that we can not now break the silence and say to France, "You ought, in common justice, you ought in pursuance of the principle of The Hague treaty, to which you are a party and to which we are a party, to arbitrate this difference between yourself and this weak and comparatively helpless country."

I believe, furthermore, that if the question of advice on the part of the Senate had been sought by the President before he sent delegates to Algeciras more than half of the Senate, if not two-thirds of it, would have advised against it.

Mr. President, I wish to conclude with just one single additional reference. The fact is not to be forgotten that all of this discussion has been precipitated by the effort to ascertain from the executive department what were the instructions, and what were the limitations of the instructions, given to and imposed upon the delegates sent to the Moroccan conference at Algeciras. That was resented not only as an intrusion—but I will not use the words that were used by some of the honorable Senators to designate that effort on the part of some of us in the Senate. It was not always so regarded. There is a notable instance in the diplomatic history of this Government where directly the contrary view was taken by the executive department. It was in what was known as the "Panama conference." There was a conference called by the Latin-American republics——

Mr. SPOONER. A congress.

Mr. BACON. The Panama conference. I think you will find it called in this volume a "conference." But it makes no difference about that—not a particle. The Government of the United States was invited to send delegates and to participate. The Senate of the United States, not taking the view of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin that it would be an intrusion, or possibly something worse, to make an inquiry of the President of the United States as to what invitation he had received and what he would do, adopted a resolution requesting the President of the United States to give information to the Senate on the subject.

So far from taking that as an affront, so far from considering it as an intrusion, so far from considering it an impropriety, the President of the United States returned to Congress not only his reasons, but also copies in full of the diplomatic correspondence, and he went further and in the message submitted the names of the delegates and asked the Senate of the United States to confirm them before he sent them to the conference. John Quincy Adams was President and Henry Clay was Secretary of State. This is found in the Congressional Debates, volume 2, part 2, 1826. Here is the message of the President of the United States, all of which I can not read, but a portion of which I will trespass enough upon the indulgence of the Senate to read:

Message of the President of the United States to the Senate relative to the Panama mission.

WASHINGTON, December 26, 1825.

To the Senate of the United States:

In the message to both Houses of Congress at the commencement of the session it was mentioned that the Governments of the Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America had severally invited the Government of the United States to be represented at the Congress of American Nations, to be assembled at Panama, to deliberate upon objects of peculiar concernment to this hemisphere, and that this invitation had been accepted.

The Senate, it seems, was not content to know the fact that the invitation had been accepted. It desired to know in advance what instructions had been given or would be given to the delegates.

Although this measure was deemed to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive, I have not thought proper to take any step in it before ascertaining that my opinion of its expediency will concur with that of both branches of the Legislature; first, by the decision of the Senate upon the nominations to be laid before them; and, secondly, by the sanction of both Houses to the appropriations, without which it can not be carried into effect.

A report from the Secretary of State and copies of the correspondence with the South American governments on this subject since the invitation given by them are herewith transmitted to the Senate. They will disclose the objects of importance which are expected to form a subject of discussion at this meeting, in which interests of high importance to this Union are involved. It will be seen that the United States neither intend nor are expected to take part in any deliberations of a belligerent character; that the motive of their attendance is neither to contract alliances nor to engage in any undertaking or project importing hostility to any other nation.

The President of the United States was not sensitive upon the subject of being inquired of as to what instructions he had given or proposed to give the delegates; he did not regard such inquiry as an intrusion, but, on the contrary, he comes forward to give the assurance to Congress in the most complete and comprehensive manner.

Then, after going on through the narration, the conclusion of the message is in these words:

In fine, a decisive inducement with me for acceding to the measure is to show, by this token of respect to the southern republics, the interest that we take in their welfare and our disposition to comply with their wishes. Having been the first to recognise their independence and sympathized with them so far as was compatible with our neutral duties in all their struggles and sufferings to acquire it, we have laid the foundation of our future intercourse with them in the broadest principles of reciprocity and the most cordial feelings of fraternal friendship. To extend those principles, to all our commercial relations with them and to hand down that friendship to future ages is congenial to the highest policy of the Union, as it will be to that of all those nations and their posterity. In the confidence—

That is in response to the request for information. He not only sends the information, but he winds up the message in this way:

In the confidence that these sentiments will meet the approbation of the Senate, I nominate Richard C. Anderson, of Kentucky, and John Sergeant, of Pennsylvania, to be envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the Assembly of American Nations at Panama; and William B. Rochester, of New York, to be secretary to the mission.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Thereafter follows a copy of all the correspondence with the diplomatic representatives of the other governments, including a letter of the Secretary of State, Mr. Clay, to the President, in which he sets out in detail and with care how scrupulously every point was guarded so that by no possibility could delegates sent to the conference engage in any deliberation or be a party to any compact which would be inconsistent with our absolute neutrality as to all controversies between other nations.

The action of the executive department was very different then from what it is now. And the attitude of the Senate then was very different from what it is now.

And while Senators are so scrupulously guarding what they consider the exclusive prerogatives of the Executive that while they seek the information they will not ask for it officially, what is the situation? There is no question about the fact—every day the dispatches bring to us the knowledge of the fact—that we are there in a powder house which is liable to explode at any time; that we are there engaged in deliberations with parties who are ready to fly at each other's throats in a most terrible war; and, as I said on a former occasion, it is no justification to say that we may not participate in anything which will lead to war, but that we may forsooth participate in preventing war.

The point is this: There can not be a conference called in Europe hereafter that will not be justified as an occasion to which we can send delegates if this is a proper occasion; and if it shall turn out that we have been beneficial in averting war and in securing peace, it will be all the more argument used hereafter why we should for all time to come be mingled in international political disputes in Europe. When it is said by the Senator from Wisconsin that in his opinion we should participate in every conference in Europe where by so doing we may avert war between European nations, the whole policy of noninterference and nonentanglement in European politics and European quarrels is given away and abandoned. If this is to be the precedent and this the principle by which we are to be guided in the future, it marks the beginning of a revolution in our cherished policy in this regard.

The Senator from Wisconsin smiled when I said we were in a powder house. Let me read something, and see whether it is a laughing matter in which we are there engaged.

Mr. SPOONER. I was simply smiling——

Mr. BACON. The Senator was smiling because I said we were in a powder house. I understand that. I do not object to the Senator smiling. It is a very engaging smile.

Mr. SPOONER. I was smiling that those envoys or representatives over there were in such danger.

Mr. BACON. We are speaking of the fact that it is resented as an intrusion that we want to know what those instructions are. That is what we are speaking about; and I am contrasting it with the action on a former occasion when the President not only responded by giving us the fullest information as to those instructions, but went so far as to supplement it by saying "I not only give their instructions, but I will send you the names of the delegates to be confirmed before they shall be allowed to go."

Mr. TILLMAN. I noticed that the Senator read a moment ago what the then President said—that there would have to be an appropriation in order to pay the expenses of the delegates or ambassadors, or whatever they were, to the conference at Panama. Where does the money come from with which to pay the people who have gone to Algeciras?

Mr. BACON. I do not know; I can not speak officially; but I understand there is a provision in the deficiency bill or one of the bills—I think it is the deficiency bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is coming. Then they have not yet been paid.

Mr. BACON. I am so informed. I would not like to be authority for the statement, but that is my information.

Mr. TILLMAN. It used to be necessary to ask the permission of Congress before contracting a debt. Now they contract a debt and come to us to pay it. Is that the way we are doing?

Mr. BACON. I wish to read something to illustrate the question whether or not we are there in the deliberations of a body concerned about commercial relations and trade and all that sort of thing. The Senator from Wisconsin enumerated the treaties, or the Senator from Massachusetts did—I have forgotten which. The Senator from Massachusetts commented on the treaty of 1880, and I have that treaty here. It is right here for anybody to look at. It is not a very long one, but I dislike to read it. But I do state this: Not only the treaty, but the diplomatic correspondence, shows that the sum and substance of that treaty was that the diplomatic representatives of foreign countries in Morocco, a semibarbarous country, if you please, and one dealing very harshly with its own subjects, had largely extended the sphere of their protection beyond what was considered to be the legitimate scope of those who were directly connected with the various legations. Thus it was that one representative of a government—one minister—would extend his protection over hundreds of Moors, subjects of the Sultan, and claim the exemption that members of a legation are entitled to. It had come to be a great abuse; it was one that was increasing; and Morocco itself said to the civilized countries, "We are being treated unjustly in this matter. We have a right to control our own subjects, and it is not proper for the minister of Great Britain or France or Spain to be protecting two or three hundred Moors here and claiming exemption for them from the operation of the laws of Morocco." That is the correspondence, and the Senator will find it so stated, if he will look it up and read it.

Thereupon those Governments met together, and the whole of this treaty, generally speaking, prescribes what people shall be entitled to protection as connected with a legation, in order that people who are not connected with a legation may not be put within the screen of diplomatic protection and thus taken where the Moroccan Government could not reach them.

The only things in the treaty outside of that were some few provisions about what right certain brokers should have there, and a general provision which has lasted from that day to this, and with which, as I understand, the Algeciras conference is prohibited from interfering, which gives to each country all the benefits of the most favored nation.

Mr. President, so much for that. I return now, of course, to this question: Is the present conference for the consideration of matters of that kind? Was there anything in that treaty to be revised by this conference or in the treaty to be made by it? Does not everybody know, is not the whole world absolutely without doubt on the fact that the Algeciras conference has been brought together because of the animosity between Germany and France, and the unwillingness of Germany that France shall have the control of power in Morocco? Does not everybody know that to-day that is the thing which keeps the Algeciras conference in session and the thing about which they can not come to a conclusion, and that in the controversy between France and Germany in that regard the whole of Europe is actually or partially aligned in anticipation of a war which may desolate the whole of Europe and change its map?

Now, let me read a dispatch from London on that subject. I suppose I may read from an English source as to what attitude England occupies in the matter. I read from a dispatch from London, February 3, which I also clipped from the Washington Post, and the authenticity of which is guaranteed by the fact that it appears in the Washington Post under the date line, "Special cable dispatch to the Washington Post, London, February 3:"

Apprehension regarding the outcome of the Algeciras conference has not disappeared. The proceedings in reference to practically noncontentious matters—

Mark that—

The proceedings in reference to practically noncontentious matters imply no increase in the hope of an agreement upon subjects which are really in dispute. It is known that no private understanding has yet been reached between Germany and France in regard to administrative and police reform, and these questions have, therefore, been postponed until the end of the conference. No agreement is possible unless some compromise is privately arranged in advance.

ENGLAND WOULD FIGHT.

In the absence of such an understanding the conference must come practically to an abortive end. This, however, does not mean war. The alarmists argue that Germany will repeat her dangerous bluff of last summer in the belief that the new Liberal government in England, while supporting France diplomatically, will never go to the length of joining in actual hostilities. If the Kaiser acts on this assumption, he will make the greatest mistake of his life. He is right to this extent only, that the present premier is an opportunist who is quite outside the ranks of real statesmen. He will do his utmost to avoid war, as it is his duty to do, but if he fails to fling the navy against Germany the moment she strikes a blow at France, he will find himself confronted by the British nation in anger.

Many sober, conservative Englishmen of all parties are convinced that a struggle with Germany in the not distant future is all but inevitable. They reason with obvious logic that the sooner it comes the better for their country. To allow Germany to crush France and turn the latter into the bitterest enemy of Great Britain would foreshadow nothing less than the destruction of the British Empire as at present constituted.

There can, therefore, be no doubt as to the course of Great Britain in case war breaks out between France and Germany, no matter what man or party may be in power here.

Mr. President, where could a situation be presented more grave than that? Under no conditions could there be a conference where it is more important that we should adhere to the time-honored principle of more than a hundred years that we will participate in no conference, that we will in no manner intermeddle with those things which concern the international politics of Europe, but that we will confine ourselves to our own affairs, to the development of our own industries, to the settlement of our own problems.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if I had entertained any doubt when I had the honor the other day to address the Senate upon the principal question which has received the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I am bound to say that the Senator's argument would have removed that doubt, and that I say with due deference to him. I have derived great gratification from this argument on the question of the relation of the Senate to the Executive in respect of our foreign relations, for I have great respect for the Senator's learning, his power of analysis, his logic, as I have for his fairness and his patriotism. I have listened to him with great care, and that I find myself at the end of his speech confirmed in the correctness of the views which he has attacked is good cause for pride.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator has argued and discussed with great beauty of language and wealth of illustration two or three propositions which are absolutely abstract and which are not in the slightest in controversy between us. If he supposes that I challenge the right, or the propriety under ordinary circumstances and within reasonable limitations, of the Senate to request information as to the making of treaties or as to our foreign relations of the President, he is mistaken. I have done no such thing. If the Senator thinks I challenge the right of the Senate to pass resolutions, as I said the other day in the extract which he has read, either in the open session or in executive session, and I repeat that is a matter of propriety, expressing its judgment upon our foreign relations, he is mistaken. I concede that right. I conceded it in the extract which the Senator did me the honor to read. I would not have challenged the propriety of the introduction of the Senator's resolution if it had been offered in executive session.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator, if he will pardon me, that the question of where offered, is not so important as the question of consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator introduced his resolution in open legislative session. That it was not considered in open legislative session was not due to the Senator or any doubt of his as to the propriety of introducing it in legislative session or as to the propriety of discussing it in legislative sesson, but it was due to a decision of the Senate, after a discussion in secret under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. President, I may say again, I hope without any offense to the Senator, that I deny utterly the propriety of discussing it in open legislative session, when the President of the United States had, in the exercise of a power which the Senator does not and will not challenge, sent representatives to Algeciras, to a conference which, as the Senator says, was attracting the sensitive interest of all Europe, liable, he says, to result in war. The President having sent representatives to that conference, as I assert again he was bound in the discharge of executive duty to do, ought not, in the presence of all the world, to be arraigned here as to his right, or the propriety of his conduct, or the limitation which he might have placed or might not have placed upon the representatives of the United States there.

Why do I say it was his duty, Mr. President? I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that in all human probability it will not occur again that the United States will be situated as to a European conference as we happened to be situated as to the conference at Algeciras. Why? Because we were invited to a conference to be composed of representatives of the governments with which twenty-six years ago we had united in the making of a treaty as to Morocco. That is one thing.

There is another thing I called attention to the other day; and I do not intend to repeat much, if anything, of what I said the other day. The Senator knows—I take it he will not ask me for my authority now, for I judge from an observation which he made that he knows—that two of the great powers—and I will name them, Austria and Italy—refused to attend that conference if all of the signatories, which included the United States, to the treaty of 1880 did not accept invitations to attend it.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I did not know the fact, because I had not had the means of accurate information. Most of what I knew I learned through the published news. I will say, however, I have not a doubt but what every government of Europe is perfectly delighted at the fact that the United States has intruded itself into a conference which is to deal with peace and war in Europe as to political international matters.

Mr. SPOONER. Very likely, Mr. President. If the governments of Europe are delighted it simply shows that they are controlled by men of wisdom, and that they appreciate the action of the President and the motive which must have led any President in the circumstances to be represented at that conference. But for the action of the President in sending these representatives to Algeciras the conference would not have been held; and if anything on earth prevents war between two great powers, both in amity with us, it will have been the assembling and the deliberations of the conference at Algeciras.

Mr. BACON. Then the Senator recognizes the fact that there is a change in this regard, and that whenever there is a threatened war in Europe on strictly European questions, it is a proper thing for us to do, if we think we can avert war, to be parties to that conference.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that is an absolute non sequitur——

Mr. BACON. I am glad the Senator thinks it is so.

Mr. SPOONER. Of which the Senator from Georgia has given numerous illustrations in the course of his observations. I speak respectfully, but I mean logically a non sequitur. I am stating the case as it exists. The Senator can find no warrant for saying, because of what I say, that I stand for the proposition that all the conferences in the long reach of time which may be called in Europe must be attended by the United States.

Mr. BACON. The Senator, then, will come to this conclusion, that whenever a war is threatened and a conference is called for the purpose of trying to compose a settlement, if any of the European powers simply say to the United States, "We will not go into it unless you do," we will have to go into it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that also is a non sequitur. I say nothing of that kind. What gave Austria and Italy the power to reasonably refuse to attend this conference unless the United States attended it? It was, as I said a moment ago, because of the fact that twenty-six years ago the United States, with all of the rest of these powers, made a joint treaty, with reference to Morocco, some of the matters embraced by that treaty being embraced by the programme sent out with the invitation to this conference, and the treaty being still in force.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator, if he has the treaty before him, to point out any provision in that treaty of 1880 which is brought in question or to be brought in question by the conference at Algeciras.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not the programme here, nor have I the papers here which I had the other day, but I say that so far as the invitation is concerned and so far as the programme is concerned I discover nothing in it that did not relate to the subject-matter of this long treaty.

Mr. BACON. I will say it is a very short treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not a very short treaty.

Mr. BACON. It is a very short treaty, and I will say to the Senator I have correctly stated its contents. I had the book on the desk at the time to-day.

Mr. SPOONER. I have the treaty here.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will read it, he will find that the treaty of 1880 referred to the very matters that I have spoken of.

Mr. SPOONER. I know what it is, and I repeat, Mr. President, that the programme accompanying the invitations to this conference are confined almost exclusively, if not exclusively, to the matters covered by the treaty of 1880.

Mr. BACON. Has that fact been communicated to the Senate in other ways than through the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, Mr. President, the Senator seems there to take my view of the constitutional relation of the Senate to the Executive. On the Senator's view, an individual Senator is a part of the treaty-making and treaty-negotiating power; is a part of the organ of communication between this Government and foreign governments, and it would have been entirely in the line of the Senator's duty, before discussing a matter of this kind in public, to have visited the Department of State and advised himself of such facts as the Secretary of State felt at liberty to communicate. It was proper for me to ask to be shown the programme and the correspondence. No one will challenge that, I take it. It was equally proper for the Senator from Georgia, and in his view of the relation between the Senate and the President I think he ought to have done it before he debated, in the absence of knowledge, some of the questions which he has discussed here.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, conceding the suggestion of the honorable Senator that it was competent for me to go to the State Department for the purpose of gaining this information, it was also, according to the recognized practice, perfectly competent to call for it to be sent to the Senate, if, in the opinion of the President, it was not incompatible with the public interest so to do. That is done continuously. There may be justice in the criticism of the honorable Senator that that should have been done in secret. I pass that by. But after I had made the effort to have the call made by the Senate, and those who stood nearest to the Administration resented it in terms which everyone on this floor who listened to me will remember, it did not become me then to go to the Department of State upon a newspaper piece of information that if I would call there it would be graciously shown me.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, Mr. President, if this resolution had been introduced in the first place in executive session, I think no one would have objected to passing it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator had it in private session and did object to it most strenuously thereafter.

Mr. SPOONER. I said this, and I say it now, that the resolution as the Senator worded it was objectionable, and I think would have been regarded, though I know nothing about that——

Mr. BACON. The Senator well knows from our long association here that there was no word in that resolution which was intentionally offensive.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, I know that.

Mr. BACON. And he also well knows that nothing more than the slightest hint or suggestion would have been necessary on his part to have had me make any modification which would be required in order that it would be in the most respectful terms.

Mr. SPOONER. When it comes to that, I will say this for the Senator: He is never offensive to anyone without adequate provocation. But frankness compels me to say that I think the Senator, upon a little reflection, would have satisfied himself that it was a grossly improper thing in the circumstances to introduce that resolution in the presence of all the nations of the world. Another thing—

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me a minute. On the contrary, I think it was a highly proper thing to do, and it did not have the slightest degree of impropriety in it, for this reason: There is nothing in the strained relations between the parties in that conference with which we have any concern or in which we participate in any degree. If there were matters between us and either of those nations which would lead to tension, then the Senator's position would be eminently correct. But the truth is we were on the outside, and there was not a single question before that conference in which there was anything in the possession of the State Department to embarrass this Government in the communication of it to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator misses my point. The resolution was introduced in the legislative session of the Senate. I think the Senator from Georgia knows as well as any man living that it was not legislative business, and that it ought not to have been introduced in the legislative session of the Senate. I think another thing——

Mr. BACON. I will just state——

Mr. SPOONER. That it was introduced in the legislative session of the Senate, Mr. President, with the intention and with the desire that it should be discussed in the legislative session of the Senate——

Mr. BACON. On the contrary——

Mr. SPOONER. And that it could have no purpose——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. On the contrary, when I introduced it I had said to others that I did not intend to debate it, and if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had not taken the action which he did, I intended simply to say that I had no doubt when those instructions were made public they would be found such as to relieve my apprehension as to our dealings with matters which would complicate us with Moroccan affairs.

Mr. SPOONER. The effect of it inevitably was an apparent attempt in the Senate to bring the President to book——

Mr. BACON. I resent——

Mr. SPOONER. Before the people of the United States upon the conduct of our foreign relations by him, in a matter which the Senator never wearies of characterizing as dynamite, sensitiveness, danger.

Mr. BACON. You mean that conference?

Mr. SPOONER. The conference.

Mr. BACON. That much of what the Senator says is true about the character of that conference, but I most utterly and emphatically deny, and as far as I can do so parliamentarily, I will resent the suggestion of the Senator that I had an improper motive in the introduction of that resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not say that.

Mr. BACON. The Senator can not escape in any such way. It would be an improper motive if I did it for the purpose of bringing the President to book, as the Senator says.

Mr. SPOONER. I say the thing itself brought the President to book.

Mr. BACON. Oh!

Mr. SPOONER. The resolution itself.

Mr. BACON. The Senator spoke of my intention.

Mr. SPOONER. I judge it.

Mr. BACON. I had stated to the Senator before he stated it what my intention was. I knew there was very great dissatisfaction with the fact that the President had sent delegates to a political European convention, involving matters of very grave moment, and likely to produce very grave results, and I would have been delighted to have had a message by the President of the United States, stating what the Senator has stated on this floor, and what the Senator from Massachusetts has stated on this floor, that they were limited in their instructions as to how far they should go into deliberations.

I am only sorry to say, having heard those statements, that it does not appear that the instructions are being carried out, if the newspaper accounts are correct as to what is being done in that conference by our delegates. I mean no reflection on our delegates, for I know one of them personally, and I have the highest regard for him. I refer to Ambassador White.

Mr. SPOONER. I am imputing no motive to the Senator, except the motive which was absolutely apparent on the face of the resolution.

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations; he is a profound international lawyer; he deals constantly, as a member of that committee as well as a member of the Senate, with our foreign relations, and no man in the Senate, or who has sat in this Senate within my knowledge, understands more accurately or sensitively the importance to this Government and to our people that foreign relations, especially of the character involved here, from the Senator's standpoint should be discussed behind closed doors; and if I do the Senator injustice when I state the fact that he introduced the resolution not in executive session—that body between whom and the President, in respect of foreign relations, the Constitution has established a bond—but in legislative session, which has nothing whatever to do with it, in the open, where the world could read it——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. If I impute thereby something offensive to the Senator——

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. I regret it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not impute by that what he did by what he said before; but I desire to ask the Senator a question. The Senator will remember that I was guilty of a similar impropriety in introducing a resolution at the time of the famous Dillingham protocol, which committed this Government to this Santo Domingan enterprise, with a provision in it that it should go into effect in ten days. That was not a legislative matter. I was so improper in my view of my duty as to introduce that resolution. Will the Senator say that I was again trying to bring the President to book?

Mr. SPOONER. I will not say that, Mr. President, because I have already discovered that that would be offensive to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Was it improper for me to introduce that resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. I think it would have been much more proper for the Senator to have introduced it in executive session.

Mr. BACON. I can not agree with the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. That ends that.

Mr. BACON. Yes; and I am glad of it.

Mr. SPOONER. That is an honest difference of opinion; but I commend to the consideration of the Senator the difference between the Sanchez-Dillingham protocol and little Santo Domingo, over there within 90 miles of where our flag floats in Porto Rico, and the conference at Algeciras over Morocco. They are as far apart as could be conceived of, morally and every other way.

Mr. BACON. The only difference is this: In the case of Santo Domingo, which is so very near to us, within sight, as the Senator has several times said in the Senate, of our flag, our interest in what occurs there may be said to be very much greater than it could possibly be in the conference in the town of Algeciras, in Spain, over a Moroccan matter, where there is not a single interest that we have of a delicate character, or of any character whatever. There is nothing we have, if we had relations with either of the governments which were to be brought into controversy there, as to which the Senator's criticism would be correct; but so far as the fact appeared to the public, so far as I know now, so far as I believe now, there is not a single question to be considered in that conference which has reference to any relations between us and a single one of the European countries which will be there engaged. So there is nothing secret at all.

Mr. SPOONER. The newspapers say that for some time they have been discussing there and disposing of the question of "the open door."

Mr. BACON. But that is a European question concerning an African country. We have the open door there now.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator makes the proposition which he made the other day—I had hoped he would not stand by it on reflection—that where we have legitimate national interests involved in proposed action at a conference, we shall not be represented there to look after our interests if, forsooth, some of the parties to the conference have political controversies with which we have no concern.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not correctly state what I said.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not correctly state what the Senator said, perhaps, but I correctly state what the Senator did in his resolution.

Mr. BACON. Well, I will tell you what I stated. I said that it would be impossible for there to be any controversy between governments in Europe of a political character over European questions, but that it would relate to countries with which we had commercial interests.

Mr. SPOONER. Very good.

Mr. BACON. And that that fact would not of itself be sufficient to justify us in intruding ourselves into those conferences; and if it did, it would be an eternal farewell to the policy of nonentanglement and nonintervention, because there could be no question that did not relate to some country with which we had commercial relations.

Mr. SPOONER. Very good. Mr. President, now here is what the Senator proposes—that there will never be any conference held in Europe in which we have any interest which will not also involve political interests in which we have no interest——

Mr. BACON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. SPOONER. And that we are not to go to look after our own interests in a European conference, unless no political interests are involved in that conference.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator does not correctly state my position.

Mr. SPOONER. The result is, Mr. President—and I do not propose to take any more time on this—that the Senator's argument the other day, and his proposition now, is that the United States shall not attend any more European conferences.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will allow me to state my position, I will not interrupt him any more. I merely wish to state it in order that I may be correct on the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. BACON. I am opposed to the United States Government attending conferences which are in essence and in fact political conferences as to European international matters and where the other pretended interests are mere devices and shams for the purpose of disguising the fact of our presence there.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, Mr. President, that is the Senator's view, and he is entitled to it. He frankly states it. I am in favor of a proposition which goes beyond that. I am in favor of the United States attending any conference to which it is invited by European nations which involves in any degree our interests—first, to look after our interests, and, second, to use the kindly offices and the influence and power of the United States to prevent war between foreign governments at friendship with us. I am not afraid, as the Senator seems to be; I am not distrustful of the present President of the United States——

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Nor am I distrustful, Mr. President, of anyone who is to succeed the present President. Taking our history from the beginning to this day, we have had Presidents of exceptional prudence and skill in the conduct of our foreign relations; we have had Secretaries of State admirably fitted, with here and there possibly an exception, for the discharge of the delicate functions involved in the discharge of the duties of their office. I think the Presidents hereafter and the Secretaries of State hereafter will know quite as well as the Senator from Georgia or any who are to follow us here whether the interests of the United States demand our representation at a foreign conference and how far we may go as a nation, our interests having been conserved, in the employment of our power and influence and friendship to prevent war between other nations. I put but one limitation, Mr. President, upon the exercise of the constitutional power of a President in that respect, and that is that we shall not attend any conference, for full participation in it, which would involve us to the extent of war or the incurring of international hostility; and I believe I speak in this respect the sentiments of our people. They are not afraid to go abroad; they are not afraid to sit in foreign assemblages, to participate in foreign conferences, not under the limitations put by the Senator from Georgia, which eliminates all such conferences, but on the broader ground and with the larger limitation which I put upon them. So much for that.

Mr. President, I admit—to come back to what I wanted to say to the Senator—his contention that the Senate may in open session, so far as the power goes, adopt a resolution such as he introduced. I challenge its propriety. I admit, as he contends, that it is entirely within the constitutional capacity of the Senate to adopt in executive session a resolution asking the President to inform the Senate whether he is negotiating a treaty, if you please, with Great Britain or with Germany, to advise the Senate upon what subject and with what view he is carrying on the negotiation, to advise the Senate as to its progress—I grant all that. That is not in controversy at all. But what I assert is, that it in no wise binds the President. He may give the information or he may refuse to transmit it. He may refuse to transmit it upon the ground that its transmission would be to the detriment of the public interest——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me right there?

Mr. SPOONER. Wait a moment until I finish the sentence.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. SPOONER. Or he may refuse to transmit it, and may give no reason, if he shall so choose, for his declination. In other words——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I will wait until the Senator finishes his sentence.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, what I contended, and what the Senator, I think, has not at all weakened is that, as a matter of power, it is entirely in the hands of the President, uncontrolled and uncontrollable, either by the Senate or by both Houses of Congress.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I want to say that when we come to talk about a question of power, we mean that we are discussing constitutional powers—the exercise of constitutional powers—we are not talking about physical power or actual power; we are talking about the legal right when we are talking about power.

Mr. SPOONER. Legal right?

Mr. BACON. Legal right, or legal duty, if it is not a legal right.

Mr. SPOONER. Call it that.

Mr. BACON. But what I rose to say to the Senator was this: The Senator will read again, as I know he has read heretofore, the message, to which I alluded in the remarks which I submitted this morning, of President Washington to the House of Representatives, where he declined to furnish them with certain information which they called for. I am not speaking now as to what the President can do, but what he ought to do, and what is recognized in him as proper to do. President Washington said that, while he refused to communicate it to the House, and gave as a reason that such things ought frequently to be kept secret, yet in that case he said it should be communicated to the Senate. He recognized the Senate. He did not say that it should be withheld, but he said the secret should be shared by the Senate with the President.

Of course I recognize the fact that the question of the President's sending or refusing to send any communication to the Senate is a matter not to be judged by legal right, but a question which has always been recognized as one of courtesy between the President and this body, and which the Senate—except, perhaps, in the case in which the Senator took a very notable part and to which I have had occasion heretofore to allude—has always yielded to the judgment of the President in the matter and has never made an issue with him about it.

Mr. SPOONER. I go beyond that.

Mr. BACON. But any resolution which I have introduced could have been easily answered by the President to the effect that, in his opinion, it was not compatible with the public interest; but the Senator and those who thought with him never allowed it to get to him.

Mr. SPOONER. If we had adopted the Senator's resolution, introduced in public, cabled to every court in Europe, coming from a distinguished member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, which is a part of the treaty-making power, and the President had communicated to the Senate in secret session, how would the matter have stood abroad? If we had been honorable men and observed the obligation of secrecy, the communication of the President would have been confined to members of this body; outside there would have been this implied arraignment of the President, or disgust of the President, either as to his power or as to his wisdom, with no reply whatever from the President.

Mr. BACON. As it happened in this case, though, the State Department gave it out that there was no cause for secrecy and that anybody who went there could see it.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not what I am talking about.

Mr. BACON. A good many have gone there and have seen it. I have not.

Mr. SPOONER. I am talking upon the principle. The Senator says "legal right" or "legal duty." I admit that we have a right to pass resolutions calling for any information from the President; but does the Senator say it is the legal duty of the President to send it?

Mr. BACON. I do not dispute the fact that there may be occasions when the President would not.

Mr. SPOONER. Who is the judge?

Mr. BACON. The President, undoubtedly. Nobody has ever controverted that; and the very resolution concerning which the Senator is animadverting was expressly conditioned upon the President viewing the transmission of the information requested as being compatible with the public interest.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it all comes to an entire corroboration by the Senator of the proposition which I made the other day, and which I supposed he had spent some time in attacking, that in the last analysis, so far as the question of constitutional power and constitutional duty is concerned, it is absolutely in the President. He is the sole organ of communication by this Government with foreign governments. At his option he may consult the Senate in advance or he may not. At his option he may send information requested or he may not.

The Senator is mistaken when he says that all there is upon that subject in the Constitution is that line of the sentence which gives the President the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties. That is not all there is in the Constitution upon which I rely to sustain the proposition that under our system the President is the sole organ of negotiation and of communication between this country and foreign governments. Under the Confederation the Congress was the sole organ; the Congress negotiated treaties and ratified treaties; the Congress received ambassadors and ministers, and the Congress practically sent ambassadors and ministers.

That was all changed when the Constitution was adopted. It was not changed for any idle reason. It was changed because it was found to be an inherent, elemental, and terrific weakness in the Confederation; and so, Mr. President, when the Constitution was formed they gave to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the power to make treaties. That is not all. They vested in the President alone the power to receive ambassadors, ministers, and other diplomatic agents. That is not all. They vested in him the power to appoint, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate as to the person only, ambassadors, ministers, etc.

A foreign minister or ambassador comes to this country. We have no function to perform in relation to his reception. He presents his credentials to the President. The President receives him or not as he may decide. Can Congress compel his reception or prevent his being received by the President? I never heard that contended until the Senator intimated it this afternoon.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, on the contrary, I said exactly the reverse. I said this——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator said they could be sent away by order of Congress.

Mr. BACON. The Senator pressed me on that and asked me how it was done. I said the Congress could sunder the diplomatic relations between this country and another, and that that would be the law; but I expressly said that where relations were existing between the countries, so far as the recognition of a particular ambassador was concerned, or another ambassador, that was in the power of the President. If the Senator will notice the stenographic report, he will find that is exactly what I said.

Mr. SPOONER. Could the framers of the Constitution any more clearly have made the President the sole organ of communication between this Government and foreign governments than they did? Of course, the power to receive an ambassador or a foreign minister implies necessarily the power to determine whether the government or country from which he comes is independent and entitled to send an ambassador or a minister. So the President is authorized to determine, and he must determine, when he sends an ambassador or a minister to some other country, whether that country is an independent country, a member of the family of nations, entitled to be represented by an ambassador or minister here and entitled to receive an accredited ambassador or minister from this country. When the ambassador or the minister has any communication to make in relation to foreign affairs, he does not make it to the Senate. If it be in the negotiation of a treaty—and most treaties are negotiated here—he has no communication with the Senate. We will not tolerate that ambassadors or ministers or diplomatic agents from other countries shall communicate in any way with the Senate or with the committees of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. The Senator says that with very great earnestness. Does the Senator understand that anybody has ever suggested such a proposition?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator implies that almost of necessity——

Mr. BACON. Oh, no.

Mr. SPOONER. When he argues that under the Constitution the Senate as an executive body is as much a factor in the negotiation of treaties as is the President or is any factor at all in negotiation.

Mr. BACON. Yes; with its own peculiar functions to perform. That does not imply that——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator does not mean that, then the Senator does not mean anything by his proposition.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is mistaken; the Senator is not justified in that statement.

Mr. SPOONER. Because to say that the Senate is as much a factor under the Constitution in negotiating treaties as the President——

Mr. BACON. I did not say that.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I said in the making of treaties, and I distinctly denied that the making of treaties was confined to the function which would succeed the transmission of that treaty to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I certainly am not mistaken. The whole point of the speech, which I had the honor of making the other day, and which the Senator has attacked—was my contention that in the negotiation of treaties the President is absolutely supreme and independent of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstands me altogether. I differed from the Senator as to what the term "negotiation" included. I said that if by negotiation the Senator means the discussion with the foreign power, or the suggestion to the foreign power, or the receiving of a suggestion from the foreign power—in other words, acting as the organ of intercommunication—if that was what he meant by "negotiation," he was correct.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a moment. But that if the Senator meant to include in the term "negotiation" not only that, but everything which related to the framing of the treaty, the determination of its terms, and everything else up to the time when it was sent to the Senate, then his definition of the term "negotiation" was too broad, and I denied that the President had exclusive right in it; but so far as the term "negotiation" could be limited to its being the organ of communication and of discussion and of original suggestion, if you please, to the foreign power, I granted the Senator's position.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator understand by the negotiation of a treaty as contradistinguished from the making of a treaty; dividing the negotiation of the treaty from the point of jurisdiction of the Senate over the treaty?

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. SPOONER. If you please, one at a time.

Mr. BACON. I said that the Senator's position was that "negotiation" included everything up to the time the treaty was sent to the Senate; I said that "negotiation" was a term which was implied under the term "make;" that the making of a treaty included the entire operation by which a treaty was conceived and framed and brought to its conclusion, and as to all such matters, even before it was submitted to a foreign power, while it was under consideration as to whether there should be a treaty and what its terms should be—that that was a part of the making of a treaty and not a part of what technically the Senator calls the "negotiation of a treaty."

Mr. SPOONER. The difference between making a treaty and negotiating a treaty is as plain as the sunlight.

Mr. BACON. But not one that the Constitution makes.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no possibility of a discussion over the meaning of the word "negotiation." You "negotiate" a contract. Everybody understands what that means. "One of the definitions of the word 'negotiate' is to conclude by bargain, treaty, or agreement." (72 Mass., 423; 22 Ky. Law Reporter, 877; Anderson's Law Dictionary, 706.) You negotiate a treaty. That is easily understood. Now, what has the Senate to do with the negotiation of a treaty, including the drafting of a treaty?

It would be nonsense, Mr. President, to talk of the President negotiating a treaty and yet of his not having the absolute power to reduce to writing the terms agreed upon at the end of his negotiation. He must have something to lay before the Senate. Is the signing of the treaty a matter that the Senate has anything to do with? Until the President is through the Senate's function does not begin.

Mr. BACON. There is where we differ.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I do not think we do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me at this point?

Mr. SPOONER. No. I do not think we do differ.

Mr. BACON. Yes, we do; materially.

Mr. SPOONER. I admit that the Senate may ask to be informed as to the state of the negotiation. The Senate may ask to be informed whether the treaty has been reduced to writing or not. The Senate may ask the President to inform it as to its terms. It may request him to send a copy in order that it may advise him, if it wants to do it, that it should be signed or not, or whether it should be amended before being signed. But the President has the same right to refuse to do it that the Senate has to request it.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. That has been the practice since the State Department was created by the first Congress under the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. That does not change the fact.

Mr. SPOONER. What can the Senate do in the way of negotiating a treaty or reducing it to writing or signing it? Will the Senator tell me?

Mr. BACON. That is the smallest splitting of small hairs.

Mr. SPOONER. I can not split it so fine that the Senator can not see it.

Mr. BACON. The question is not as to matters of detail; as to whether every "t" is crossed and every "i" is dotted——

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say that.

Mr. BACON. Or even as to the drafting of it. The question is whether the President has in the Senate advisers whom he can bring to his assistance before he submits a treaty to the Senate, or whether the Senate is in a position where, in a case in which it thinks there is a public interest requiring its intervention, it has the right to suggest to him and to advise with him voluntarily, without his request, or whether, as the Senator says in the speech from which I have read to-day, that no right of the Senate attaches and no duty of the Senate begins until the President sends in his message. There is a vast difference between the two.

Mr. SPOONER. I repeat it, the function of the Senate begins, under the Constitution, when the power of the Senate begins, under the Constitution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator from Wisconsin let me in?

Mr. SPOONER. Not now. The Senator can give me information on some things, but not on this.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can give it to you on this one point. I have it right here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Georgia fails to note the distinction between privilege and power.

Mr. BACON. No; I do not.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator tell me what power the Senate has?

Mr. BACON. I shall——

Mr. SPOONER. Wait a minute. Will the Senator tell me what power the Senate has to intervene in the negotiation of a treaty by the President up to the time of its signing?

Mr. BACON. That is the very point I was trying to bring to the attention of the Senator when I tried to differentiate between power, in the sense of a man who can go and compel a thing, and a legal right, as contemplated by the law. The law contemplates that the Senate shall be the adviser of the President, not simply after he has sent us a treaty, but at any time, either at the instance of the President or at the will of the Senate, in no instance having the power to compel the President to formulate, as they see fit to suggest, in the same way that the President has no power to compel the Senate to consent to it. Each of them is supreme in their respective functions.

Mr. SPOONER. If the framers of the Constitution had intended to make the Senate a potential factor in the negotiation of treaties, they would have done it.

Mr. BACON. I think they have done it.

Mr. SPOONER. They would not have left the President entirely at liberty to refuse the Senate any participation, even to the extent of informing the Senate, in response to a courteous request, of the state of the negotiations or the subject-matter of a proposed treaty. They would have given the Senate the right to demand, not to request. They would have made it the duty, not compellable by mandamus—no, no; they would have made it the sworn duty of the President to respond to the request for information. They did neither, Mr. President. It would have been a breach of constitutional duty for the President to refuse information which under the Constitution the Senate had a right to demand, and the President would have been answerable on the complaint of the other House. Had they intended not to invest the President with the absolute power of the negotiation of treaties, they would have made the Senate's power efficient. They would not have made it a mere question of "If you please, Mr. President, the Senate would like to be informed of the status of the negotiation, if any exists, between this country and Great Britain." They never would have left it in that way.

Mr. BACON. The Senator forgets that the only power to negotiate is a power implied by the power to make, and that the Constitution, in conferring the power to make, confers it upon two and not upon one.

Mr. SPOONER. But implied powers are as perfect as expressed powers.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, he might as well say, as to the failure of the Constitution to give the power of compulsion upon the President, that there was equal failure in the omission to give the President power to compel the Senate to ratify. The one is as logical as the other.

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all. The Senator asserts a relation under the Constitution between the Senate and the President in respect to the negotiation of treaties which he can not sustain, or he imputes a purpose to the framers of the Constitution which they have not expressed, and which they have not in anywise, even by inference, made apparent.

Mr. BACON. There is where we differ. I think it is very evident that the Senator and I are not going to agree.

Mr. SPOONER. In one clause of the Constitution—and the Senator remarked upon that—the nomination of a person for office is separated from the "advice and consent of the Senate." It could not have been otherwise. It would have been quite absurd for the framers of the Constitution to have said that the President and the Senate might "appoint" officers. That would have left it open to debate as to who should take the initiative. It would have been unenforceable for its looseness and its stupidity. Some one must select the official. That, of course, being an executive function, was given to the President. That had to be done before the Senate could "advise and consent" to the appointment. That in the very nature of things was a condition precedent. How does the other differ? The Senator saw a difference in the language of the two provisions, in that in the one case they drew the line between the nomination and confirmation; in the other they did not.

The Senator forgot that negotiation is of necessity antecedent to the making of a treaty, as completely as the nomination of an officer is precedent to his confirmation or final appointment. It is as clear as the sunlight that the framers of the Constitution intended the President should negotiate the treaty, for he is the organ of communication with foreign governments. They gave that power to no one else, and the Senate could not advise and consent to the treaty until it had been negotiated and signed and laid before it. Somebody must do that preliminary work. If it is not given to the President, it is given to no one. It was given to the President. He has done it from the foundation of the Government. No one has ever challenged it. The Senate, to my knowledge, never has demanded a right to participate in the negotiation of treaties. Whenever the President has consulted the Senate it has been entirely in the exercise of an option which the Constitution gives him. He may exercise it or not. He keeps his oath to support and defend the Constitution as faithfully in the one case as in the other. The great sage of Democracy, Mr. Jefferson, did not agree with the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from South Carolina——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will not the Senator allow me to quote him?

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will please not interrupt me at this point.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have the words of the sage right here, and I want to give you some of his utterances.

Mr. SPOONER. Have you? Read them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Thank you. I have been waiting half an hour here endeavoring to give some light to my friend the Senator from Wisconsin, and, perhaps, the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SPOONER. I can get light from Thomas Jefferson on this question.

Mr. TILLMAN. You did not think I had this book here, over a hundred years old, and was going to give my own views?

Mr. SPOONER. I thought it was a new edition of the Constitution, revised, amended, and annotated by BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, of South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN knows some little about it. He has learned it from his friend the Senator from Wisconsin. I read:

[Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, to Mr. Morris, minister plenipotentiary from the United States to France.]

PHILADELPHIA, August 23, 1793.

DEAR SIR: The letter of the 16th instant, with its documents accompanying this, will sufficiently inform you of the transactions which have taken place between Mr. Genet, the minister of France, and the Government here, and of the painful necessity they have brought on of desiring his recall. The letter has been prepared in the view of being itself, with its documents, laid before the executive of the French Government. You will, therefore, be pleased to lay it before them, doing everything which can be done on your part to procure it a friendly and dispassionate reception and consideration. The President would, indeed, think it greatly unfortunate were they to take it in any other light, and therefore charges you, very particularly, with the care of presenting this proceeding in the most soothing view, and as a result of an unavoidable necessity on his part.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that all?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator give me some idea as to how long he will take?

Mr. TILLMAN. Just long enough to give you some light; that is all.

Mr. Genet, soon after his arrival, communicated the decree of the National Convention of February 15, 1793, authorizing their Executive to propose a treaty with us on liberal principles, such as might strengthen the bonds of good will which unite the two nations; and informed us in a letter of May 23 that he was authorized to treat accordingly.

This, you see, was written in August.

The Senate being then in recess—

Now listen, please—

The Senate being then in recess and not to meet again till the fall, I apprised Mr. Genet that the participation in matters of treaty, given by the Constitution to that branch of our Government—would, of course, delay any definitive answer to his friendly proposition. As he was sensible of this circumstance, the matter has been understood to lie over till the meeting of Senate. You will be pleased, therefore, to explain to the Executive of France this delay, which has prevented as yet our formal accession to their proposition to treat; to assure them that the President will meet them, with the most friendly dispositions, on the grounds of treaty proposed by the national convention, as soon as he can do it in the forms of the Constitution; and you will, of course, suggest for this purpose that the powers of Mr. Genet be renewed to his successor.

That is, the Senate—

Now, just one comment and I will let you off.

Mr. SPOONER. I have the light the Senator intended to give me.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very glad he got it, but the point I wanted to illustrate is this: Jefferson, who was certainly familiar with the opinion of the makers of the Constitution—more so than the Senator from Wisconsin—and who was Washington's Secretary of State, recognizes here the principle that the Senate is such an important part of the treaty-making power that he does not feel willing even to enter upon negotiation with the minister from France until the Senate reconvenes.

Mr. SPOONER. That all shows that Mr. Jefferson was a very skillful, adroit, and accomplished diplomat.

Mr. TILLMAN. Just like my friend the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. That was a paper which Mr. Jefferson wrote for the eye of the French Government as to a proposed treaty which Mr. Jefferson then did not desire to enter into and which Mr. Jefferson never did enter into.

But I have a few sentences here from Mr. Jefferson. I do not know whether it will be any "light" to the Senator from South Carolina, but in Mr. Jefferson's Opinion on the Powers of the Senate, a very celebrated document, which he gave at the request of the President, this language was used:

The transaction of business with foreign nations is executive altogether.

I will read that again:

The transaction of business—

That covers the negotiation of treaties, I should suppose—

The transaction of business with foreign nations is executive altogether. It belongs, then, to the head of that department, except as to such portions of it as are especially submitted to the Senate. Exceptions are to be construed strictly.

That is what Mr. Jefferson said on this precise question in a carefully prepared opinion for the guidance of the President, whose Cabinet officer he was. To give the opinion was a part of his official duty under the Constitution. I put that against that adroit diplomatic letter for the eye of the French Government.

He says another thing on the subject of the powers of the Senate:

The Senate is not supposed, by the Constitution, to be acquainted with the concerns of the executive department. It was not intended that these should be communicated to them.

Referring, I suppose, to the same subject of foreign intercourse. Judge Story says (sec. 1510):

SEC. 1510. In the formation of treaties, secrecy and immediate dispatch are generally requisite, and sometimes absolutely indispensable. Intelligence may often be obtained, and measures matured in secrecy, which could never be done, unless in the faith and confidence of profound secrecy. No man at all acquainted with diplomacy but must have felt that the success of negotiations as often depends upon their being unknown by the public as upon their justice or their policy. Men will assume responsibility in private, and communicate information, and express opinions which they would feel the greatest repugnance publicly to avow; and measures may be defeated by the intrigues and management of foreign powers, if they suspect them to be in progress and understand their precise nature and extent. In this view the executive department is a far better depositary of the power than Congress would be.

The delays incident to a large assembly, the differences of opinion, the time consumed in debate, and the utter impossibility of secrecy all combine to render them unfitted for the purposes of diplomacy. And our own experience during the confederation abundantly demonstrated all the evils which the theory would lead us to expect. Besides, there are tides in national affairs as well as in the affairs of private life. To discern and profit by them is the part of true political wisdom; and the loss of a week, or even of a day, may sometimes change the whole aspect of affairs and render negotiations wholly nugatory or indecisive. The loss of a battle, the death of a prince, the removal of a minister, the pressure or removal of fiscal embarrassments at the moment, and other circumstances may change the whole posture of affairs and insure success or defeat the best concerted project. The Executive, having a constant eye upon foreign affairs, can promptly meet and even anticipate such emergencies and avail himself of all the advantages accruing from them, while a large assembly would be coldly deliberating on the chances of success and the policy of opening negotiations. It is manifest, then, that Congress would not be a suitable depository of the power.

SEC. 1511. The same difficulties would occur from confiding it exclusively to either branch of Congress. Each is too numerous for prompt and immediate action and secrecy. The matters in negotiations, which usually require these qualities in the highest degree, are the preparatory and auxiliary measures, and which are to be seized upon, as it were, in an instant. The President could easily arrange them, but the House or the Senate, if in session, could not act until after great delays, and in the recess could not act at all. To have intrusted the power to either would have been to relinquish the benefits of the constitutional agency of the President in the conduct of foreign negotiations. It is true that the branch so intrusted might have the option to employ the President in that capacity; but they would also have the option of refraining from it, and it can not be disguised that pique or cabal or personal or political hostility might induce them to keep their pursuits at a distance from his inspection and participation. Nor could it be expected that the President, as a mere ministerial agent of such branch, would enjoy the confidence and respect of foreign powers to the same extent as he would as the constitutional representative of the nation itself, and his interposition would, of course, have less efficacy and weight.

SEC. 1512. On the other hand, considering the delicacy and extent of the power, it is too much to expect that a free people would confide to a single magistrate, however respectable, the sole authority to act conclusively, as well as exclusively, upon the subject of treaties. In England the power to make treaties is exclusively vested in the Crown. But however popular it may be in a monarchy, there is no American statesmen but must feel that such a prerogative in an American President would be inexpedient and dangerous. It would be inconsistent with that wholesome jealousy which all republics ought to cherish of all depositaries of power; and which, experience teaches us, is the best security against the abuse of it. The check which acts upon the mind, from the consideration that what is done is but preliminary, and requires the assent of other independent minds to give it a legal conclusiveness, is a restraint which awakens caution and compels to deliberation.

SEC. 1513. The plan of the Constitution is happily adapted to attain all just objects in relation to foreign negotiations. While it confides the power to the executive department, it guards it from serious abuse by placing it under the ultimate superintendence of a select body of high character and high responsibility. It is indeed clear to a demonstration that this joint possession of the power affords a greater security for its just exercise than the separate possession of it by either. THE PRESIDENT IS THE IMMEDIATE AUTHOR AND FINISHER OF ALL TREATIES; and all the advantages which can be derived from talents, information, integrity, and deliberate investigation, on the one hand, and from secrecy and dispatch on the other, are thus combined in the system. * * *

The Senator from Georgia seemed to think that by the use of the word "supreme" the other day as a characterization of the President's power over the conduct of our foreign relations I was exaggerating the power of the President and imputing to him rather a royal attitude, one which would be as offensive to him as it would be to me—no more so.

This is what I meant. I still use the word. I used it advisedly then; I use it advisedly now: This is a Government of enumerated powers. It is divided by the Constitution into three great departments—the executive, the legislative, the judicial.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. In a single sentence the executive power is vested in the President. In a single sentence the legislative power is vested in Congress. In a single sentence the judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court and certain inferior courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. In a moment.

In the exercise of the powers vested by the Constitution in the legislative department it is supreme, absolutely independent of the President, whose function in connection with legislation is the power of veto; which means what? Not of necessity the power to pass a law nor even to kill a bill which has been passed by Congress. It is a power to bring about a reconsideration by Congress of a measure which has passed both Houses. It is a power to put to Congress a locus penitentiæ, and when the bill comes back to Congress with the President's reasons for challenging further consideration of it it may become a law notwithstanding, if the legislative department so wills. It is his function to recommend legislation; to approve or disapprove bills after they have passed the two Houses of Congress. In his functions, under the Constitution, he is supreme, uncontrolled and uncontrollable, not answerable to us or to the other House; answerable to a different constituency from any to which individual Senators are answerable. So as to the courts—the Supreme Court and other constitutional courts of the United States. They derive the main body of their jurisdiction and powers from the Constitution, in law and in equity. They exercise other powers conferred by statute. Some of those which have been conferred by statute may be taken away by statute. But it does not rest in the power of the whole people, except by amendment to the Constitution, to take away from the Supreme Court of the United States or other constitutional tribunals one shred of the jurisdiction conferred upon them by the Constitution. That is what I meant.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will not the Senator let me get in?

Mr. SPOONER. I am trying to give the Senator some light.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; but the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. That is what I mean.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will not use the offensive phrase "special pleading" any more.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish you would not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER. If this is special pleading, nothing that ever can be uttered in this Chamber with which a Senator disagrees will be anything aught than special pleading. If a devotion, frankly expressed, to the Constitution as the fathers made it; if a vindication of the powers of each of the departments conferred by the Constitution, and a protest against any invasion by either upon the other is special pleading——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. We have fallen upon unhappy times.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will he permit me now?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has gotten a little away from the point we were on. I will try to get him back to it.

The other day in his eloquent speech I took occasion——

Mr. SPOONER. A large part of which you made, I notice, by looking at the RECORD.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will be egotistical enough to say that my part was not less interesting than that of the Senator, though it may have been less instructive.

Mr. SPOONER. That depends upon the locality.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course.

In that speech I asked him to define what was meant by the term "advice"—"by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"—but he never elucidated the point. We must construe English words as other people use them, not as some lawyer has wrenched the language out of all ordinary interpretation and has made it to fit his case. The word "advice" simply means you are going to tell a man something or give him counsel before he does anything. When he has acted rightly or wrongly in accordance with your advice or not, then you can consent or refuse to consent.

Mr. SPOONER. I have the question.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; that is not the point.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the point?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator did not satisfy me that his interpretation of the word "advice" was correct, and I want to bring him——

Mr. SPOONER. It does not follow from that——

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to bring him to a personal illustration of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. From my conception, as a matter of common sense, I think the word "advice," taking it in the matter of the appointment of officers, for instance, with which the President is charged, it was supposed by the fathers would convey the meaning that when the President was going to make an appointment in a given State—for instance, Wisconsin—he would confer with the representatives from that State in the Senate, who would finally have the veto anyhow, if they could persuade their fellows to stand with them, and that the President would get their opinion as to the fitness of certain men. But that has gone clear away, except as a matter of politics.

Now, the Senator is strenuously contending for the Executive prerogative and is announcing the doctrine that the President is supreme, which as a technical meaning I will acknowledge. I saw in the papers about two weeks ago or ten days ago that two Senators from a State up around Lake Michigan had called at the Executive Office to see the President, and when they came out these par nobile fratrum, Arcades ambo, one of them, who happened to be my friend the Senator from Wisconsin, said: "Nothing but a little appointment; not worth mentioning." Did the Senator go to the President and "advice" him or advise him, or what did he go there for?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I will say this. It absolutely is none of the Senator's business [laughter]; but——

Mr. TILLMAN. When the Senator from Wisconsin begs the question like that it shows that I have got him up a tree, and that is all I wanted. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator had contained himself until I finished the sentence he would have discovered his mistake.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection, and I know my colleague will not object to saying why we went there. We disagreed——

Mr. TILLMAN. What did you have to do with it, however? I thought the President had the whole thing in his charge and that he had no obligation to confer with Senators or anyone else.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Chair be kind enough to keep the Senate in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. We agreed to state our respective contentions to the President and let him decide upon the division of a piece of territory. He decided. We both acquiesced. It was all in good feeling and good temper and we came out and went off in amity. My colleague went his way and I went my way.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator allow me to intrude into the privacy——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. SPOONER. No; the Senator will not yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER. If it is anything relating to this debate I will yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is relating to this question which the Senator said he would answer. I will not intrude if the Senator does not wish me to do so.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will finish his question, I will yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is simply this: The Senator said there was a division of territory. Now, I am a little curious to know whether the patronage in Wisconsin has been divided along geographical lines and the Senator who now speaks has certain territory in which he will advise the President and the other Senator will take the balance of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that, also, is not a South Carolina affair.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course not.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a Democratic district.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then a Democrat ought to have some representation or say-so in it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Democrats are better represented in that district by my colleague and myself than they might be if somebody else represented them; and they are perfectly satisfied with the way we administer our functions.

Mr. TILLMAN. So you say.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, I think I know more about it than the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would call the attention of Senators to the rule, which requires Senators to rise and address the Chair before proceeding.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Chair's pardon.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, on this matter of advice and consent, I will take but a moment. The words are not susceptible of the easiest possible construction. Take them in connection with the confirmation of a nomination, would not the word "consent" have been entirely adequate? "Advice and consent" in that connection would seem to involve the use of two words when one, and either one, would have answered the purpose.

When it comes to a treaty it may be different, because all the Senate can do in acting upon a nomination is to confirm it or reject it. It can not strike out the name sent in and insert another. When it comes to the function of passing upon a treaty, the Senate may reject, the Senate may ratify, the Senate may ratify with amendments and advise the President to endeavor to secure acquiescence in those amendments. In the one case the action is absolute against the treaty; in another it is absolute in its favor; in the last it is qualified ratification of the treaty, and it amounts to an advice that the President shall secure acquiescence in the treaty as amended and then exchange ratifications. But aside from technicality, all it means (and no one can make it mean any more or any less) is that the Senate consents, either with or without amendment, to the treaty.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. BACON. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Carolina. I apologize to neither State.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I said the other day, North Carolina might not want to own me.

Mr. SPOONER. These Senators seem to think that the President is obliged to consult Senators about appointments. I have heard that said on this floor——

Mr. BACON. Obliged to consult?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; that it is a part of his constitutional duty. I have heard it said on this floor more than once. My friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] I doubt not has heard it a great many times. There is nothing in it. There is no constitutional duty resting upon the President to consult me or to consult my colleague as to an appointment in Wisconsin. The President has a constitutional right to choose the men for himself. The custom has grown up for obvious reasons because convenient and helpful to the President to consult the representatives of the people—those who are familiar with the inhabitants of the State. But the Constitution says that the President shall nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not of Senators, appoint. So the President may make treaties, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—my good friend from Georgia, the Senate—two-thirds of the Senators present being under the Constitution to make a Senate competent to act upon a treaty.

Mr. BACON. The Senator sticks in the bark.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not stick in the bark. When I make an answer to something that is urged by the Senator from South Carolina I am indulging in a specious, special plea, and ingenuity. When I attempt to make an answer to my friend from Georgia I am seeing with too fine an eye, I am indulging in metaphysics, or I am sticking in the bark. Do I stick in the bark when I say that in its relation to the ratification of treaties the Constitution deals with the Senate as a body. It says that. Does it not mean that? There is nothing in the Constitution, Mr. President, which implies a duty or even a right, except that word "advice"—misconstrued, I think, in that relation—upon the part of the President to consult Senators about treaties in advance of the document being sent to the Senate.

I deprecate, and would deprecate the habit of consulting individual Senators as to the negotiation of treaties. Why? For the same reason in part that I hope again to vote for a bill which shall render it impossible for any member of this body to serve in the negotiation of a treaty. Why? Because that man comes here handicapped. He comes here having negotiated, as the agent of the President, a treaty which should have his absolutely independent judgment, apart from any element of favoritism or special partisanship for the document because he drafted it.

That is the interest of the people. I was caught myself once. I was consulted as to a treaty, hastily, as it always is, and I found afterwards, when I wanted some amendment put into that treaty for the protection of the Government, it was suggested that I had agreed to it in advance. I believe the President ought to be left free, as he is under the Constitution, to negotiate treaties. If he can call to his aid the advice of a Senator, who chooses to give it, let it go. That is a matter for each Senator to decide for himself. But it is better for the popular interest that Senators should hold to their function, so that when a treaty is negotiated and sent into this body every man goes to its consideration with a free mind—with no committal outstanding, expressed or implied—ready to study it impartially and to listen impartially to the debates upon it in the frankness of executive session.

That is clear to me, as it is clear to me, Mr. President, that under the Constitution in this unique relation every Senator owes it to himself under his oath and in the dignified and faithful discharge of his duty as a Senator to vote for or against a treaty with a foreign power as his brains and his conscience dictate.

I am not in favor of intermeddling in the discharge of the functions of the different departments. A man who has control under the Constitution of the negotiations must be free. The Senator from Georgia read from Hamilton. What he read from Hamilton I have seen criticised by more than one commentator. I find I quoted in a former speech what I shall read from Hamilton, in one of the Pacificus letters, for the Senator will remember that later Hamilton as strongly contended, I judge on maturer reflection, for the control over negotiations for which I contend. Hamilton said:

> The right of the Executive to receive ambassadors and other public ministers may serve to illustrate the relative duties of the executive and legislative departments. This right includes that of judging, in the case of a revolution of government in a foreign country, whether the new rulers are competent organs of the national will and ought to be recognized or not.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I had before me at the time——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has not yielded.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; of course I yield.

Mr. BACON. I had before me a comment of Madison on that very utterance, in which Madison (frequently called the father of the Constitution, and certainly no man was more attentive to its deliberations and few men more influential in its conclusions), as to that very utterance, refuted and condemned it in most unmeasured terms, and stated that if such a thing had been suggested at the time of the convention it would have been absolutely scouted. I have not that here—the Reporters have it—it is from some papers that I read from in part, and with the permission of the Senate, when I come to revise the notes, I will put that in in conjunction with what I quoted before, so that it may all appear.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, there has not been from the beginning of this Government, so far as I have ever been able to learn, a single commentator or writer on the Constitution who challenges the proposition which I announced the other day and for which I am contending here to-day. Kent stated it as broadly and strongly as it could be stated. Mr. Justice Story, when a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, stated it explicitly.

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Did he not?

Mr. BACON. No; he said it would be binding upon the judicial department of the Government, and that is true, but that does not meet the proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that what he said?

Mr. BACON. That is my recollection of it. I am quoting it from memory simply.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not recollect it.

Mr. BACON. Read it and see. I will say to the Senator it is the case he quoted the other day. I referred to it, and that is what I understood him to say.

Mr. SPOONER. No; this is what he said. In Williams v. The Suffolk Insurance Company (3 Sumner, 272 et seq.) Justice Story said:

> It is very clear that it belongs exclusively to the executive department of our Government to recognize from time to time any new governments which may arise in the political revolutions of the world; and until such new governments are so recognized they can not be admitted by our courts of justice to have or exercise the common rights and prerogatives of sovereignty.

So Mr. Justice Story states, and it ought, it seems to me, to need no exposition, to need no judicial determination. What is it? It is a matter of independence. It is a status. It is a fact. That is what it is; no more, no less. It is whether a people with defined boundaries govern themselves without coercion or intervention or repression by extraneous power. I do not state it well, but I state it sufficiently. The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed this judgment in Williams vs. The Suffolk Insurance Company, 13 Peters, 420, Mr. Justice McLean delivering the opinion, in which it is said:

> And can there be any doubt that when the executive branch of the Government, which is charged with our foreign relations, shall in its correspondence with a foreign nation assume a fact in regard to the sovereignty of any island or country, it is conclusive on the judicial department? And in this view it is not material to inquire, nor is it the province of the court to determine, whether the Executive be right or wrong. It is enough to know that in the exercise of his constitutional functions he has decided the question. Having done this under the responsibilities which belong to him, it is obligatory on the people and Government of the Union.

Now, whether independence exists or not is what? It is a question of fact. It may be one way this week. It may be an entirely different thing as a fact three months from now.

Tell me, some one, in what possible sense the recognition of independence is a legislative act? It is not the function of legislation to declare facts. What is a law? As I recollect Blackstone's definition, it is "a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in the State, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong." It is a rule of conduct, and when that rule is once laid down it binds the people until it is changed by the power that made it.

How about this function of recognizing independence? If that is a legislative function and the Congress passed an act the effect of which was to require the President to recognize the independence of a particular State, to receive the ambassador or minister from that State, that law must be obeyed until the Congress meets again and modifies it. In the meantime a revolution occurs and the erection of a part of the territory into another nation.

Would that act be still effective? Where would it leave the President of the United States? Must he call a special session of Congress to "reenact" this fact of independence, to enable him to receive a minister from a new country or to send one to a new country? It is impossible. Justice Story speaks of the contention of the Senator as having been long mooted, but he states explicitly that it has been discussed as a mere abstraction, and that all the practice of the Government from the beginning has been against it; and so it has.

Suppose the Congress passes an act fixing the value of coin in a certain country, naming it; that is a recognition sub modo. Would that require the President to send an ambassador or a minister to that country? Would that require the President to receive an ambassador or minister from that country? Not at all. But leave that. Mr. Seward, a great lawyer, said:

> It is, however, another and distinct question whether the United States would think it necessary or proper in the form adopted by the House of Representatives at this time. This is a practical and purely executive question and a decision of it constitutionally belongs not to the House of Representatives nor even Congress, but to the President of the United States.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I stated to the Senator that I did not propose to go into any argument on that question. I have made an argument in the Senate on this subject, in which I did go through all those grounds.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; I have passed that on. I am going on to the negotiation of treaties.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon. I just wanted to say——

Mr. SPOONER. I say my friend from Georgia has no authority, and I venture to say he can find no authority, which in anywise impeaches the proposition which I made the other day, and which I suppose he intended to demolish, that the absolute control of the negotiations which lead up to a treaty laid before the Senate is in the President under the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. The difference between the Senator and myself is what the term "negotiation" implies or includes.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, I will tell the Senator that I understand negotiation to mean negotiation.

Mr. BACON. That is clear.

Mr. SPOONER. There are some things so plain that they can not be made plainer. That is a word of everyday use. It is so fixed in its meaning in every man's mind that to attempt technically to define it confuses one. What does it mean to negotiate a loan? What is meant by negotiating a contract or negotiating a sale? Negotiating a treaty? It means all the steps which lead up to the meeting of the mind, whether it involves nations or men, for it is a compact or contract or agreement between this and another government; and it includes writing down the agreement as it has been negotiated, because, after it is drafted it is still subject to negotiation, and it is often changed—modified by one or the other—and when the negotiations have all ended, when it has been signed, then it comes to this body, and then—I repeat what I said the other day, standing, Mr. President, as religiously in favor of each of the departments of the Government in its own sphere as any man who ever sat in this Chamber does—it is solely when it comes to this Chamber, our constitutional function, not to inquire, not to ask questions, but to make treaties, begins and not till then.

A resolution demanding of the President information as to the negotiation of a treaty would be an insult. Nobody could debate that.

Mr. BACON. Well, the Senator has been rather free in the use of the word "insult."

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not take that as referring to him. The Senator——

Mr. BACON. The Senator has used that word before.

Mr. SPOONER. I probably, in the course of my life, which I hope will be a long one, will use it many times.

Mr. BACON. I mean in connection with this very matter.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not discussing Algeciras. I said the other day that for the Senate to adopt that resolution either in open session or in secret session and send it to the President was, in my judgment, an insult.

Mr. BACON. I distinctly take issue with the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not impute any purpose to the Senator to be offensive to the President, but I think a resolution which assumed that the President either does not know what his powers are or disregards them——

Mr. BACON. I can only say again, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I can only say again that when the Senator in the discussion of a legal proposition has to resort to the suggestion that it is an insult, it is a confession, on the part of one of his resources and abilities, of the weakness of his argument.

Mr. SPOONER. Why, Mr. President, it would be the tawdriest, cheapest, and most stupid of resources.

Mr. BACON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, let the Senator refer for a moment to what elicited this observation. I was arguing an abstraction, and I, thinking of the relative position of the Executive and the Senate, and the contention that the Senate is a factor in negotiations and there was the legal right and the legal duty, because the legal right on the one hand would involve the legal duty on the other, they are correlative—I was testing it by suggesting that so far from its being true that a resolution passed by the Senate demanding—using that word——

Mr. BACON. I did not demand it.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about the Senator's resolution.

Mr. BACON. That is what the Senator said about my resolution, and he said it more than once.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about your resolution. I will enter into a solemn agreement with the Senator in writing—it will not take more than a moment to negotiate it—that I will not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would not the Senate have to advise and consent to it?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not referring to the Senator's resolution, and I will not refer to it. I say again, then, if the Senate should pass a resolution demanding that the President should furnish any information in regard to foreign relations, that would be an insult to the President. That is all I have said.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, who has ever contended for any such demand?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not say the Senator has.

Mr. BACON. No; but who has contended for it?

Mr. SPOONER. Well, a Senator who contends that the Senate, under the Constitution, is a factor in negotiating a treaty and talks of legal rights on the part of the Senate and legal duties on the other hand—if I can understand the fair inference from words, the inevitable conclusion from a major and a minor premise—certainly has it in his mind that it might be done properly, because what we have a right to ask it is of necessity the duty of the President to grant. The best argument I know of to refute that is to bring to the attention of Senators the fact that a resolution in strict exercise of that supposititious right would be very offensive to a President. That is all.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is ingenious, but not logical.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator could not at all afford to admit that I am logical.

Mr. BACON. For that reason the Senator in the beginning of his remarks this evening was particular to announce that he had not been converted by what I had said.

Mr. SPOONER. I see that offended the Senator——

Mr. BACON. Oh, no.

Mr. SPOONER. And I regret it.

Mr. BACON. No; I am too familiar with the habit of lawyers to be offended about such a matter.

Mr. SPOONER. It was not that. The only reason in the world that the Senator has not convinced me is, first, my own incapacity——

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; we all recognize the Senator's capacity.

Mr. SPOONER. And, second, his power of reasoning, because I freely say that if the Senator was sustainable in logic, in history, in the practice of government, or by authority, he would have at once overwhelmed and convinced me. As I said, I thought it was a compliment, but it seems not to have been so regarded, that it would be my pride for many years, that the Senator had not been able, with all his logic, ability, and frankness, to do more than confirm me in the strength and correctness of the position which he was assaulting.

Mr. President, I have finished.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, with the permission of the Senate, immediately after the morning business, I shall ask leave to address the Senate upon the subject of railroad rates in connection with the resolution lying on the table offered by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The notice will be entered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 6, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I have here a resolution purporting to be introduced in the House of Representatives January 27, by Mr. VAN DUZER. I have endeavored to obtain some information about this resolution, and the result of my inquiry is the ascertainment of the following facts: Mr. VAN DUZER asked leave of absence after the Christmas holidays. He has not been here since. He asked indefinite leave of absence, on account of sickness in his family. He has not been here since that day. The day the resolution purported to be introduced, January 27, he is recorded as absent and paired. This resolution, therefore, sir, in my judgment, is not properly before the House, and I send the following motion to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the motion is, but before it is read I wish to say that Mr. VAN DUZER was caught in a wreck on a train on its way to Washington, was crippled in that wreck, and is now at home—I suppose at home—or elsewhere, at a hospital where the wreck occurred, one or the other. He is in Hazelton, Pa., I am told, now; and that accounts for his absence. Will the gentleman let me see the original resolution?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I desire to state that there is no desire on my part to pass the slightest reflection upon Mr. VAN DUZER. The object of this motion is this: The resolution has now become a privileged question, and it can be called up by anybody; and to-day we have the anomaly that a resolution that is not before this House under parliamentary rules has become a privileged question, and can be called up; and it is to cure that situation that I offer this motion.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair that the motion better be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is read, I would like to state that my object in rising was to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that whatever the motion may be, it would be better, as a matter of courtesy, and I think better all around, if he would wait until Mr. VAN DUZER returns.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. In answer to that, I will state that it will give me great pleasure so to do. I have endeavored to find Mr. VAN DUZER, tried to find his clerk, addressed letters to his clerk, which have remained unanswered. I think my friend from Mississippi will see that here is a privileged resolution which can be called up by any Member of the House at any time, and that it is not properly before this House; it could not have been introduced by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. VAN DUZER], for he was absent then, and has been absent ever since. It is a matter that is generally known, and this action casts no reflection upon the gentleman from Nevada whatever. The only intention is to cure the parliamentary status of this resolution, which, in my judgment, is necessary.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think if the resolution should be read, we might get at it more easily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor. It seems to the Chair that the proposed action to be moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to be reported to the House. It may or may not be privileged. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the said resolution, No. 197, be canceled as a resolution of the House, and that the copies in the document room be removed and destroyed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to ask what the resolution is that is sought to be repudiated?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have the resolution here and I will read it.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Mississippi, but I have charge of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; I will ask the gentleman to read it.

Mr. PAYNE. Would it not meet the views of all parties to have the resolution and the motion lie over until the return of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. VAN DUZER]?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is just what I suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from New York will go further with him than mine.

Mr. PAYNE. That was before the motion to cancel the original resolution was read.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. If any guaranty will be given that no Member of the House will call up the resolution under the privilege, I have not the slightest objection to it. I do not desire to be discourteous to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYNE. If some Member should try to call up the original resolution, would not that also call up the motion offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not pass upon that question until it is presented. It would not necessarily do so, as it seems to the Chair, although if that question comes before the House, the Chair will rule upon it when it becomes necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me——

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the proposed action is predicated upon the assertion that at the time the original resolution was introduced the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. VAN DUZER] was not in Washington. That, of course, depends upon evidence aliunde, which can not come before this House. I do not know whether it be true or not that the gentleman from Nevada was not here upon the day that this resolution was introduced. The gentleman says that there is no reflection cast upon Mr. VAN DUZER by his motion. There is a reflection cast upon somebody. Somehow or other this original resolution got here, and it bears the name of Mr. VAN DUZER. Somehow it got into the box. I know nothing about the matter, never saw the resolution until this morning, but I think it is nothing but fair and right that this matter should go over until the gentleman from Nevada can be present. I have told the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the Speaker of the House, and the Members of the House, what had happened to him and where he is. When we needed him here on the statehood vote a telegram came that he was caught in this wreck and was seriously hurt. He has not been able to attend the House since, and I insist that this matter ought not to be taken up for action now. I think we would save the time of the House if the gentleman from Pennsylvania were to withdraw the motion and let this entire business go over as unfinished business until the return of the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. PAYNE. I think it should be understood that the original resolution offered by Mr. VAN DUZER is to go over with the resolution or motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the matter go over in its present status.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I am not attacking the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. VAN DUZER], but the gentleman from Mississippi admits the fact that he is not here, and has not been here, and could not have introduced this resolution. This is a matter to protect the House itself against unparliamentary procedure. If bills and resolutions bearing the name of a Member can be tossed into the basket in his absence, it is a very serious parliamentary situation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The House has no evidence of such fact.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that this is a privileged question, there having been no point of order raised against the resolution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania rises in his place to a question of privilege and suggests that what purports to be a record of the House is not a record of the House, and states that the gentleman from Nevada was not present in Washington upon that day. The gentleman from Mississippi states that on the day before—the 26th—having been caught in a railroad wreck, he was not here. This seems to have been introduced on the 27th. Now, so far as the Chair is concerned, the Chair does not care, if it is for his information, to have an argument as to whether this question is privileged or not. The House can take such action as it sees proper to take.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman knows, and I hope the Speaker knows, that I am as little disposed to take up the time of the House unnecessarily as any Member upon the floor, but in the absence of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. VAN DUZER] I could not permit this action to be taken unless it were taken with a quorum of the House and under all the guards that the rules extend. I know nothing about the matter. Now, I again repeat the request. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] to let both of these matters go over without prejudice; let this matter in its present status go over until the return of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. VAN DUZER].

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] can give me assurance that no Member will call this up under the House rule on privilege, that is agreeable to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that if the gentleman from Mississippi were reckless enough to make that assurance the gentleman from Mississippi could not assure himself even that the assurance would be observed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest, with the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and of the gentleman from Mississippi, if the House desires to do so, it seems to the Chair that unanimous consent might be given that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the resolution purported to be offered or that was offered, as the case may be, by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. VAN DUZER] shall go over until the further action of the House, and no action be taken upon the resolution until the House has acted further as to its consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And without prejudice.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that amounts to an agreement that a motion to discharge the committee should not be privileged pending the proceedings.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. That is my only object in bringing this up at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RAILROAD RATE REGULATION.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) for the regulation of railroad rates. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that all general debate upon this bill be closed on Wednesday, to-morrow, at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate shall be closed upon the bill H. R. 12987 on Wednesday, to-morrow, at 3.30 o'clock p. m. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and I were discussing the termination of general debate and trying to end it on this afternoon, we saw we could not finish with the number of requests for time that we had, and my understanding, as I remember it, was that we would try to get through by 4.30 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, in order to begin the reading of the bill to-morrow afternoon. Will that be satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, Mr. Speaker; that is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his request, fixing the hour of 4.30 p. m. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad-rate bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987, with Mr. VREELAND in the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted me for the discussion of this important measure I can not present it in the elaborate manner that I would like to do.

I congratulate this House and the country that is under the leadership of the strenuous gentleman who occupies the White House, the Republican party has at last been "able to sit up and take notice" and to hear the demand of the people for legislation along the line of this bill.

Unwillingly, it is true, have they listened to the muttering storm of indignation as it rose higher and higher, until, fearing the results of that indignation, their sodden conscience has at last been quickened to the necessity for action.

Now, with that peculiar facility of Republicans to claim the earth and the fullness thereof, they even claim the paternity of the infant, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], in his eloquent non sequitur speech the other day, seemed to work himself up to the point of believing that he was partly the father of the bantling himself. But fair-minded gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber know that to the Democratic party belongs the honor of inaugurating the movement which is about to culminate in the passage of the pending measure.

When the doctrines of this bill were ten years ago being advocated by the leader of the Democracy it was denounced as socialism and anarchy. When the Democratic platform of 1896 made demand for this character of legislation it was called the enemy of progress and the foe of prosperity. At least two gentlemen on the Republican side of this Chamber have been fair enough to call it a Democratic measure, and to even try to frighten their friends from its support by this admission. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] said the other day: "He [Mr. Bryan] looked upon it as his own child, and not long ago as he was starting around the globe, in almost the last words he uttered upon American soil, with a paternal solicitude, he commended the bantling to the tender care of the President." If the distinguished gentleman means by this that the Democratic party only took it up after the President in his message advocated it, he is mistaken.

Here are the platforms of the Democratic party for the last three Presidential elections. See how they read:

[Declaration from Democratic platform, 1896.]

The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a strict control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restriction and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

[Declarations from Democratic platform, 1900.]

CORPORATE INTERFERENCE IN GOVERNMENT.

Corporations should be protected in all their rights and their legitimate interests should be respected, but any attempt by corporations to interfere with the public affairs of the people, or to control the sovereignty which creates them, should be forbidden under such penalties as will make such attempts impossible.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

We favor such an enlargement of the scope of the interstate-commerce law as will enable the Commission to protect individuals and communities from discriminations and the public from unjust and unfair transportation rates.

[Declarations from Democratic platform, 1904.]

TRUSTS AND UNLAWFUL COMBINES.

Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity, and any trust, combination, or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition, or fixing prices should be prohibited and punished by law. We especially denounce rebates and discrimination by transportation companies as the most potent agency in promoting and strengthening these unlawful conspiracies against trade.

For ten years the leader of Democracy has been proclaiming the doctrines of these platforms from the hilltops and amid the valleys, and back of him was the great Democratic party. Now, gentlemen, point to any platform of your party that has ever squinted at rate reform. Point to any President or great leader of your party that has ever advocated its principles till now.

Not till after the election under which your President was seated in the White House did he hint to the railroads or to the country that he would lead the crusade for rate reform. Not till after the election, and you ceased to need campaign contributions, did one of your great leaders in Congress or on the hustings declare for this legislation.

But now, when the voice of the people is heard demanding the passage of this bill you tumble over each other to get on the band wagon. But, gentlemen, we welcome you to our aid. I am not one of those who believes that no good thing can come out of Nazareth, and when we see you coming to us on the Philippine tariff, on rate legislation, and, I hope, on some other great questions, we well may say:

While the lamp holds out to burn,
The worst standpatter may return.

[Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to be unjust to the railroads or to railroad interests. I can do no better than to quote from a speech that I had the honor of delivering in this House one year ago on this same question. I said:

I regard them as one of the greatest harbingers of progress of any human agency, and I have no feelings of unkindness for them. In my district we need more of them. In some portions of the district they have made the country blossom as the rose. They have climbed the mountain tops, and along their wake splendid towns have sprung up like magic, and prosperous people greet the shriek of the locomotive. Some of the most fertile lands in these same counties need but the iron horse to make them fivefold more valuable than they are. In some of these counties a single railroad pays more than one-fourth of the entire taxes of the county.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor of representing a rural people. Many of them and their children have not had the advantages of profound literary training. But they are an honest people; a people who fear God, revere justice, and uphold the law. They would not regard me as their faithful Representative were I on this floor to rave like a howling demagogue against railroads or other corporate interests or demand the destruction of these great adjuncts of development and progress. The effort has been made each time that I have been before the people for election to this House to array them against me because of my relation to railroads, but each time it failed, and the last time by a more emphatic majority than ever. Each time I have told them that whenever the interests of my people clashed with that of corporate power they would find me on the side of the people whose commission I bore. My people believed me, they trusted me, and now, as their Representative, I shall raise my voice and cast my vote for what I believe to be their best interest. They are not unjust or unreasonable in their demands. They do not ask a pound of flesh from next to the heart. They do not seek to confiscate or destroy the holdings of these great corporations, but they do ask, Mr. Chairman, that these corporations, to whom so much has been granted by the people, should be required to do that justice to these people which they demand for themselves.

For several years after the creation by Congress of the present Interstate Commerce Commission it was thought that it had the power to regulate freight rates. Railroads prospered then, and under the legislation proposed by both these bills they will continue to prosper. The Commission assumed to regulate rates until the Supreme Court of the United States held that they had no such power, and yet the restraining hand of the courts were always ready to see that no such rates should be fixed as were unreasonable or destructive of their property.

The power of review by the courts is ingrafted in this bill, and should the time ever come when a political commission, as described by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], should deal unjustly by the railroads, then, Mr. Chairman, the strong arm of our courts is ever ready to lend them aid. This power of regulation, not of rate making, as some assert, should be lodged somewhere.

Under section 8 of the Federal Constitution it can not be lodged with the States. That section says among other things:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and with the Indian tribes.

Thus we see that the power to regulate interstate commerce is taken from the States, and we have the spectacle of sixteen States of the Union having commissioners to regulate rates on commerce within State borders, and yet, when its destination is a foot beyond State lines, the commission is impotent to give relief. Gentlemen tell us that the bill confers upon seven men the power of confiscating the property of the railroads, and that, if it should pass, it would be a deathblow to railroad expansion and enterprise. No such results as have been predicted will follow. Stringent laws of this kind have been in force in many States for years, and yet new railroads have been built and old ones extended in these States just as in others.

There are many reasons why there should be some regulation, and, as a sequence, why the power of regulation should rest in some tribunal. All corporations as well as all people should be amenable to law. Individuals throughout the land are restrained by the old common-law maxim, "So use your own as not to injure another's." Then is it unreasonable or unjust that this same great principle of law and benign safeguard of society should apply with equal vigor to corporations as well as individuals?

Railroads, of all other entities, ought to be willing to abide by this wholesome doctrine. They enjoy many concessions that are not made to ordinary individuals. Their very existence is ushered in by concessions that no private individual can exercise. In their very construction they have the right of eminent domain, by which they can raze to the ground the most valuable structures and appropriate the most fertile lands. These important concessions and valuable privileges are granted to them for the very reason that they are public utilities and operated for the public good. Congress itself has conferred upon them the right to appropriate a part of the public domain for rights of way and depot facilities, on compliance with certain easy formalities. To many of them have been granted vast areas of land to aid in their construction, and many homes that would have been settled by the poor of the land have passed into the hands of these great corporations. Then is it not right that as a partial compensation for such vast concessions they should be willing to exercise their functions in the interest of all the people as well as in the promotion of their own selfish aims?

The progress and development of the age necessitates their use. There is a kind of duress upon everyone living in civilized and progressive communities to use them. The very nature of these vast aggregations of wealth and power is essentially that of a monopoly, and such a monopoly as must be made to bow to law—not the law of confiscation, nor even of oppression, but a law which will say to corporations when they themselves are seeking to oppress, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further."

This is all my people ask; this is all this bill proposes; and under its benign influence I expect to see the railroads prosper and the people prosper, and without friction or antagonism to move forward hand in hand till within a few years both will rise up to proclaim this Congress blessed for having given this benediction to the country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, the continued demand of the people of this country is about to be recognized. This fact is forcibly demonstrated by the action of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in completely ignoring political lines for the time and reporting unanimously to this House a bill to regulate railroad rate charges.

The wonderful growth of the railroads in the United States is unprecedented in the history of the world. They have grown until they have reached in value the enormous sum of $16,000,000,000. The many small and independent systems of railroads have almost disappeared, for the reason that from time to time they have been bought up and in different ways merged into larger systems, and these larger systems have been continually forming into still more gigantic ones until they have reached a position of organized and tremendous power for good or for evil.

These great and expanding corporations have learned that they must cultivate harmony among themselves; that they must work together in unison, for they know that for them to compete with each other would mean greatly decreased earnings, hence they have destroyed real competition among the roads and have made it a thing of the past, in consequence of which the most powerful compact or pool among the railroads of this country ever known in the history of the world has resulted. Now, with this gigantic and all-powerful combination of the transportation facilities of the country to contend with, what is to become of the people—the patrons of these roads? The truth is, they are perfectly helpless and completely at the mercy of the railroads.

THE PEOPLE MUST BE PROTECTED.

The people must and will have protection. Then what is the remedy for this evil? There can be but one answer, one solution of the question, and that is place all railroads under National Government control. Congress has the power to do this, and, in my opinion, the Hepburn bill now before the House, giving the Interstate Commerce or Railroad Commission the right to say what are reasonable and just rates and providing for an appeal to the Federal courts when the railroads are dissatisfied with the judgment of the Commission, very wisely compasses the solution of the problem.

Mr. Chairman, for the Government to regulate the railroads in their rate charges does not and should not mean to destroy or even to harm the railroads. No one could desire that. They represent too much capital, contribute too much to the support of the Government, and too much and too many are dependent upon them; and they are too great a factor in the growth and industrial development of this rapidly expanding country. But the rapid growth and the colossal wealth of the railroads, by their scheme of combinations and other devices, have conferred such power on them as to render them dangerous to an unprotected people. While we do not desire to destroy the railroads, we intend to see that the railroads shall not destroy the people.

MANY FAVORS EXTENDED RAILROADS IN PAST.

Many franchises have from time to time been given to the railroads by National and State governments and by the people at large, with the view and the implied agreement that fair and just treatment would in return be accorded by the roads, but that expectation has been broken to the hopes, and the people and the roads are daily drifting farther and farther apart, until the roads have ceased to consider the interests of the people and the public have come to regard the roads as selfish and a natural enemy to their welfare.

The railroads in their tremendous power, ever ready to invite litigation and commanding the best legal talent to be had, have continuously evaded and at times defied all laws enacted with reference to their regulation and the control of their management, rates, etc.

Prior to the enactment of the interstate-commerce act of 1887 the friends of remedial legislation had before them two plans: One advocated by a distinguished Representative from Texas, Mr. Reagan, proposing certain prohibitions and requirements and penalties that the carriers should be subjected to, but providing no additional methods for their enforcement and no new aids for the discovery of wrongdoing or for securing the punishment of the wrongdoers. The law proposed was to be administered by the judicial system then in existence. The other scheme, presented by a distinguished Senator from Illinois, Mr. CULLOM, contemplated the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission as it now exists, with the duties and powers now imposed by law, with substantially the same prohibitions, requirements, and penalties to be imposed upon the carrier. The powers of the Commission enabled them to hear complaints, to investigate facts concerning them, to search for violations of the law, and to aid the courts, through their discoveries, in enforcing the law. This latter system was established by the act of 1887; was somewhat improved by the amendments of two years later, and is retained in the bill reported with the powers enlarged and made more definite.

The act known as the "Elkins Act" of 1903 gave additional strength to previous legislation through its more specific prohibitions relating to rebates, discriminations, and preferences. Yet the ingenuity of some of the carriers and shippers has resulted in avoiding the provisions of that act through the use of joint tariffs, involving, in some instances, a railroad and a mere switch owned by a shipper; through arrangements whereby excessive mileage was given to the shipper of products who owned his own cars; through the use of refrigerator cars; through the permission given to independent corporations to render some service incident to the shipment, as the furnishing of ice in the bunkers of the car; by what is known as the "midnight tariff," a method involving an arrangement with a shipper to assemble his freights, have them ready for shipment at a particular date, whereupon the carrier would give the necessary three days' notice of a reduction in the rate—competing carriers and shippers would know nothing about this arrangement—the freight would be shipped at the new lower rate, and then there would be a restoration of the old rate; and by other means and devices.

The railroads, in violation of all these laws, continued the practice of rebates, secret and preferential rates, and favoritism. By their unlawful conduct they have built up one section of country to the injury of another, have given certain favored cities advantageous rates over those of a less favored one. They have bestowed on large shippers advantages in rates over the smaller ones; have helped the cities to the detriment of the towns, and, by their unfair treatment, have made the strong stronger and the weak poorer.

Railroads have added much to the wealth and strength of the commercial trusts of this country by such practices as secret rebates, joint tariffs, and other methods in violation of existing law.

Under such a deplorable condition of affairs as this, can there be any astonishment that the people should rise and demand that they be protected against such unfair and unlawful practices?

RAILROAD RATE REGULATION A DEMOCRATIC IDEA.

The President of the United States realized that the all-powerful railroad interests must be controlled by an impartial commission to the end that the people, the patrons of the roads, might have justice; hence he strongly urged upon Congress the absolute necessity at this session of such legislation in his annual message.

While it is true the Republican party has heeded the demand of the people, I am going to maintain that this is a Democratic victory, for that party has for years urged in its platforms the necessity for government of railroads, and it is to the credit of a distinguished Democrat and then a Representative from Texas, Mr. Reagan, that he suggested, first in 1887, a plan for Federal regulation and control of railroads.

Yes, this is a Democratic victory, and several distinguished gentlemen on the Republican side of this House have in their speeches suggested the correctness of this contention. However, I am glad to see a virtually united front of the entire House on this great question. In fact, to be successful in this undertaking fraught with so much good to the people politics for the time must be laid aside.

I am informed that the railroads have felt until lately safe from any legislation on this line, depending upon their great influence to stifle all effort, but they now are feeling some alarm, for they begin to realize that they have been overconfident.

Mr. Chairman, I now heartily congratulate the entire country on the splendid prospect of this bill being enacted into law. It augurs well for the people. It means that the time has come when the Government must and will regulate all of the powerful trusts and combines formed for the purpose of destroying competition and putting the consumers of the country—the people—under the merciless power of their avarice. The passage of this bill to regulate railroad rates will be the first firm and positive step in the direction of Federal regulation of interstate commerce, and the country may hopefully and happily look forward to further relief from monopolistic injustice and greed. As I have said before, no injury is intended by the bill to the railroads, and it does seem to me that every honest management of such corporations should approve of this legislation.

POWERS OF THE COMMISSION.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is to be composed of seven good and experienced men. While the Commission will not have the power to make rates for the railroads, it will have the authority to pass upon the rates as published by the railroads, and will have the right to say whether such rates are just and reasonable. When in the opinion of the Commission a given rate, against which complaint has been lodged with the Commission, is unjust and unreasonable, the Commission can then fix the maximum or highest rate that the railroads will be permitted to charge. If the railroad is dissatisfied with the ruling, an appeal can be taken to the Federal courts, the rate fixed by the Commission remaining in the meantime or pending the appeal the controlling rate until the court resorted to has passed upon the issue. While the bill does not go as far as I would like it, in that it does not confer as much power as it should on the Commission, yet it is drawn on conservative lines and should commend itself to the approval of everybody. Yet the railroads are opposing this fair legislation.

There are now in operation in the United States 217,000 miles of railroad, representing a capital of $16,000,000,000 in stocks and bonds. A political economist of distinction, one of the professors of Yale, who has given much study to the cost of railroad building, states that they can be built for $35,000 per mile. If that be true, and certainly it is a reasonable proposition, the total cost of all the railroads in the United States would be $10,000,000,000; then $6,000,000,000 of the capital stock of all the railroads of the country must represent a fictitious value, or what is known as "watered stock," having no value and representing nothing. Now, is it not unjust to the people for the railroads to insist on a profit on $16,000,000,000 capital when, in point of fact, the actual capital represents only $10,000,000,000?

To state the proposition more clearly, the railroads are entitled and should have a fair and reasonable profit on $10,000,000,000 actual capital, but never on $16,000,000,000 capital, of which $6,000,000,000 represents absolutely nothing but a speculative vision.

PUBLICITY.

The power of the Commission to compel railroads to make statements of their condition will go far toward effectively regulating this evil. Publicity is one of the strong features of the bill. In fact, there is no greater corrective and deterrent agency than publicity. It is said by those charged with the prevention of crime in New York City that six electric arc lights are worth more than a hundred armed custodians of the peace in the suppression of lawlessness.

The railroads and their defenders argue that by reason of the complications growing out of the relations of the different roads, the great mileage they cover, and the almost endless classifications of rates, the task and responsibility of regulating and adjusting such vast and intricate questions are too great to be confided to a commission composed of seven gentlemen. Such a contention is not well founded, when the fact is the rates for all the railroads in the United States are at present made by less than a dozen men.

THE PRIVATE CAR SYSTEM.

The private car system, including all refrigerating and icing privileges, is also placed under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The growing fruit interests of my district, undoubtedly larger in acreage and production, relative to territory, than that of any other part of the South, will gladly welcome this legislation. While this service has lately been greatly improved over the past by these private car companies, still their service and rate charges have not at all times been satisfactory to the shippers; therefore the passage of this bill will mean better service and fairer rates, thereby encouraging and fostering the growth and prosperity of this great and valuable industry of the South.

THE WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

The railroads and their advocates have endeavored to create sympathy for the interests they represent by claiming that a large amount of the capital stock of these corporations is held by the widows and orphans and have argued that any mode of Government control of rates would result in a decrease in the value of their property, and, consequently, in the amount of their income. The fact is, that class of stockholders is small—indeed, but a trifle—compared with the many wealthy owners of such stock. But, I repeat, the honest railroad management and the roads that are not overcapitalized can not be injured by the acts of a fair, honest, and intelligent Commission whose duty it will be to see that justice is meted out equally to the people and the roads.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Much has been said and many articles from numerous contributors written expressing the apprehension that Government interference with railroad rates would decrease the earnings of the employees of the roads. I presume many Members of Congress have received petitions from some of these employees protesting against any legislation on this line for that reason. Nevertheless, I take the position with the greatest confidence of its correctness that the employees of the railroads will in no wise suffer. Their salaries will not be decreased. Does the salary of the railroad employee rise and fall with the changing financial condition of the roads? I answer, no.

Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of the House to the wild fluctuations in the market values of stocks and bonds of the railroads in the past two years. It is a fact that the common stock of many of the roads has increased in value over 100 per cent, while I doubt if there has been the least advance in the salaries of the employees during all this period of great prosperity enjoyed by the railway companies. In the meantime the cost of all food products and other necessaries of life have steadily advanced in price.

Wage-earners are entitled to fair pay and should and will continue to receive it. The salaries of railway employees is now and will ever be based more on the amount of hauling or business the road does than on the prosperity of the road or the rate charges made by the roads, for so long as the roads have business they will be compelled to have employees. When the roads find themselves short of business, the result will be not the reduction of salaries, but the shortening of the hours of work.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to close my remarks feeling assured that this bill will pass the House and with a strong conviction that it will pass the Senate. We are told by the President in his own forceful words that he is extremely desirous of an opportunity to approve it. When the law is put in operation, forcing as it will the railroads clearly to understand that they must respect and consider the welfare of the people, I freely predict that the common carriers of the country will willingly give far greater consideration to the rights and the interest of the shipper and the public than ever in the past, and on the other hand that the people will place more confidence in the railroads, all contributing to the happy situation that the two forces heretofore estranged will be more reconciled in their relations with each other, thereby further stimulating and fostering the rapid growth and development of our beloved country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GUDGER].

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, in obedience to the general demand of the masses, we are now engaged in the enactment of a law which embodies one of the cardinal principles of Democracy. We are all practically agreed that legislation is needed to prevent rebates and other discriminations in favor of one shipper as against another, and which will result in so regulating freight rates that justice may be done alike to the shipper and the consumer, and which will at the same time permit of a reasonable profit to the carrier. I congratulate my friends on the other side of the House upon the patriotism they are displaying in thus rallying to the support of this good old Democratic doctrine. [Applause.] I do not wish to be understood as attempting to minimize in the least the importance to the country of this great measure. I shall give it my most hearty support, and I am gratified at the prospect of its early enactment, notwithstanding the obstacles that are being thrown in the way of its passage by those who are profiting by its absence from the statute books. But I desire to call attention to another great question confronting the nation, which has not received that degree of consideration from Congress that its importance demands. It is even of greater consequence than the rate question, because it is wider in its scope and more far-reaching in its effect upon the general welfare of the country. I refer to the question of immigration. Rate legislation involves primarily the question of how much money should be charged for transportation, while the question of immigration involves considerations which in my judgment reach the very foundation of the Republic itself. [Applause.]

A review of the statistics of immigration discloses an increase in the number of foreigners annually coming to our shores, which is appalling when the character of the immigrants is considered. In the year 1820 they numbered only a little over 8,000. In 1860—forty years later—they numbered more than 133,000. In 1900—the end of another forty-year period—the number increased to nearly 450,000. During the fiscal year 1905, only five years later, there were more than a million of them. Think of it, gentlemen! At the rate they are now coming they would equal the population of North Carolina in less than two years, and a Congressional district as large as my own in a little more than two months. The annual immigration has more than doubled in the past five years. At the same ratio of increase it would require only a little over one hundred years for our country to reach the limit of the density of population. By that time we would have eight or nine hundred millions of people, or a territory as densely populated as the Empire of China. This of itself is enough to arouse us to a full realization of the importance of checking this swelling tide of immigration. But this is by no means the gravest phase of the question. I concede, of course, that a great many good citizens have come and will still come to us from other countries, but statistics show that in more recent years a very large part of our immigration comes from a strata of civilization far beneath our standard; that they are composed in a great degree of the vicious and ignorant elements of foreign countries; that they are lacking in comprehension of the principles of our form of government and have no sympathy with them, and that they do not possess the mental or moral qualifications which should be insisted upon as a prerequisite to clothing them with the rights and privileges of American citizenship. [Applause.] Moreover, the percentage of this class of immigration is now rapidly increasing. This is doubtless due in a large measure to the fact that the great steamship companies are sending their agents throughout foreign countries, where they gather up the indigent and illiterate, who are willing to come across the water as steerage passengers; and it is reputed that they are making millions of dollars out of this nefarious business. In our warfare to protect the public weal against trusts and combinations we might with profit devote some of our time to legislating so as to limit the operations of these companies.

As a result of our lax system of immigration laws, we are permitting our country to be flooded annually with a horde of undesirable aliens, who come here to incite strikes and resistance to organized authority and to infuse into our body politic the spirit of socialism, communism, anarchy, and other evil influences which sap the lifeblood of a nation. [Applause.] If it is permitted to continue unchecked, it can hardly mean less in the end than a change of our nationality.

But putting aside for the moment the question of the effect of this immigration upon our Government and civilization, I desire to call attention to another phase of it. The Republican party seeks to pose as the champion of American labor, and points to its tariff legislation as an evidence of its desire to protect the industries and the laboring interests of this country from the products of the pauper labor of foreign countries. I shall not take time to discuss now the question as to the utility of such legislation to that end, but I challenge the consistency of their course in building a tariff wall around this country for the avowed purpose of keeping out the products of pauper labor when they, although having unhindered control of every branch of the Government for many years, have not lifted their hands to close the flood gates through which the pauper laborers themselves come in. [Applause.] Surely the importation of the products of pauper labor can not do as much harm to American labor as does the presence of the pauper laborers themselves. The competition is more direct and, necessarily, more disastrous. On the other hand, it is a benefit to the employers of laborers, because it enables them to obtain labor at a lower rate of wages. So that whatever benefit the American laborer might otherwise obtain as a result of the protective tariff, it is more than offset by the failure of the Republican party to enact effective legislation to keep out the pauper laborers themselves, and in the end the employers of laborers—the captains of industry—are the only ones who are benefited.

The Commissioner-General of Immigration in his last annual report calls attention to the fact that during the last decade the percentage of immigration arriving at the southern ports, as compared with those arriving at other ports, is increasing. This is said to be due, in part at least, to the concerted action of certain railroad interests with a view to diverting immigration to the South in the hope, of course, of ultimate profit to their business. This significant fact brings the question directly home to the Southern people. I have no sympathy with the views of some of my Southern friends, that we need more immigration there of the kind now coming to this country. The men who cultivate their hundreds and thousands of acres of cotton; the men who employ large numbers of laborers, may need them, but the small producer and the small business man does not. It might be better to have them if we considered the question solely from the standpoint of the present and of the men who desire to make money regardless of future consequences, but we are not legislating for the present alone. We are legislating for our children and our children's children. [Applause.] The South is growing richer every day. It is filled with resources yet undeveloped, and it is capable of developing them without entering upon the untried experiment of introducing aliens to assist in that development. It is filled with a God-fearing, law-abiding, patriotic people, and its standard of citizenship is equal to that of any other country or section of country in the world. [Applause.] It would be far better to let some of its mills and factories remain idle and some of its cotton plantations remain unproductive than to introduce this alien element into its population, which must ultimately lower its standard. Those engaged in the production of cotton are now directing their attention to the question of the reduction of acreage in order to maintain the price of that staple. What better method is there of reducing the acreage than that of curtailing the number of laborers available for employment?

Speaking for my own State, and more especially for the district I have the honor to represent, I say to you that we do not want any more immigrants from the low, vicious classes. I have in mind one of the counties of my district in which four large mill towns are located—Forest City, Caroleen, Henrietta, and Cliffside. They are all within range of the ringing of a single bell. The owners and employees are in perfect sympathy and accord. There are no foreigners there, who hold the law in contempt, and consequently no strikes. They have good schools and churches and are as good citizens as can be found anywhere in the State. I have been there on Sundays, and have seen them attending the Sunday schools, some of the employees acting as teachers and some of the employers as pupils. They are American citizens—American born and bred—and typical of the good citizenship now existing throughout the South. [Applause.] They do not want any foreigners to help them in their business. They are able to take care of it themselves. We are too prone in these days of prosperity to say, "Let well enough alone." But we know from the history of the past that the hour of adversity must come, and when hard times come and depressions upon us and there is less demand for the employment of labor, capital will seek it where it can get it the cheapest. Then shall we see the folly of our inaction, and then the American laborer, whose interest it is our first duty to protect, will be the sufferer. I feel that I am voicing the predominant sentiment, not only of the Democracy of North Carolina, but of the entire South, and representing her best interests regardless of political considerations when I appeal to you, gentlemen, to join us in the enactment of some measure to meet this impending danger. [Applause.] I shall not stop to discuss the question as to what specific character of legislation would be most effective to that end. It might be done by a head tax or an educational test or in some of the other ways that have been suggested. Perhaps all of these restrictions could be applied with beneficial results.

What needs to be accomplished, however, is to arouse Congress and the country to a full consciousness of the fact that something should and must be done, and the remedy can easily be found. But that some remedy is needed, and needed immediately, can not be gainsaid. If we would keep our country in the place it has now fully earned—that of the foremost Republic, aye! the foremost nation of the earth—we must shield it from those baneful influences which have always operated to the detriment of other nations, and which sooner or later bring disaster to us. If we would have the mighty current of our national power move onward unchecked toward the fulfillment of its mission, we must preserve that standard of American citizenship from the contaminating influences that are now crowding in upon it. The majestic Anglo-Saxon character must be preserved; the Celtic and Teutonic blood that helped to make our splendid citizenship must not be mingled with that of the lower types of mankind. We can best accomplish this by standing firmly for the policy of "America for Americans." [Applause.] Let the balance of the world call this selfishness if it will; but, after all, national selfishness is the highest type of patriotism.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I trust that the importance of this subject may be felt to that degree that we will give it the most careful and thoughtful consideration. Action is necessary to success. Restriction of foreign immigration must be had in order to protect our American wage-earner against the vicious, ignorant, criminal pauper labor that is now being permitted to enter our ports.

The demand is for a strong and effective law strictly enforced in order to maintain the high standard established by our American laborer. This right to such wages as to enable him to have a comfortable home, money to properly educate his children and maintain his dignity as an American citizen must be upheld. They are the men that produce the wealth, defend our country in time of war, and represent the good citizenship of this country. It is therefore our duty to protect them along these lines with such legislation as will preserve in the future America for Americans. [Great applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague [Mr. DICKSON], such time as he may desire.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that it is impossible for me to add much of interest or information to the masterly expositions of distinguished Members in the matter of the proper regulation of rates as treated in the bill now pending before the House.

I feel, however, that coming from one of the largest districts in the great State of Illinois, traversed by many miles of railroads, between whose right of ways there thrives the varied industries of shop and field; a district populated by almost 300,000 honest, loyal citizens, it might seem meet and proper that their voice, through their Representative, be recorded in this council.

I can not hope to enter the realm of discussion touching the intricate ramifications of this bill, nor shall I presume to expound the constitutional questions involved, but rather view it as it appeals to one who has at heart the welfare of his people and the idea of a "square deal" to all interests.

In my judgment, the pending measure is an honest effort to correct the discrimination, rebates, and other abuses that at the present time exist in our railroad traffic.

This bill is just to all, in providing that charges for transportation of passengers and freight shall be reasonable, all unjust and unreasonable charges being prohibited.

It affords publicity—that implacable foe of indirection and dubious method—by providing that every common carrier shall print and keep posted for the inspection of the public schedules, showing rates, fares, and charges; all classification of freight;

all "icing charges," and charges for that most potent agency of evasion, the "private car line" and the "terminal."

Every carrier is compelled to file with the Interstate Commerce Commission copies of all schedules, promptly notifying the Commission of any changes therein, and filing all joint tariffs between connecting lines. For the purpose of compelling compliance it provides that any carrier refusing to file a schedule as provided, may be mandamused and punished for contempt and enjoined from transporting property until such time as they may be prepared to obey the law.

It is provided that common carriers shall each year make a complete exhibit of their financial operations.

The Commission may require carriers to keep a uniform system of accounts, prescribing the manner in which they must be kept, the Commission having at all times access to all records of every kind belonging to the carrier.

This bill stands for a "square deal," in providing that the Commission must, when shown that a rate is unjust, or a practice unjustly discriminatory, preferential, or prejudicial, prescribe instead, a fair, reasonable, and justly remunerative maximum rate, following this with an order that the carrier shall not collect any rate in excess of the one prescribed. Such rate, when prescribed, to become effective within thirty days.

This bill not only furnishes redress for existing wrongs, but provides a penalty for the violation of administered remedy, in that any carrier neglecting or refusing to obey the lawful order made by the Commission shall forfeit for each day's refusal $5,000, and further provides effective procedure for the collection of such penalty.

These, together with the many other features of the bill touching the matter of "secret rebates," "discriminations," further details of publicity, the increase of the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission from five to seven (remedial features that have been so fully explained on this floor) will by their operation overcome many existing transportation evils.

I can not subscribe to that doctrine heard on the floor during this debate, that the railroads of the country are wholly culpable and their officers and managers go "about the earth seeking whom they may devour."

I do not forget that there have been no corporations in this country which have done more to increase the wealth, happiness, and prosperity of our people than the railroads.

They have entered unexplored and arid areas and made possible their population by an earnest, industrious citizenship. In the main, they have exhibited rare foresight and great judgment in promulgating measures for the general benefit of our country and its people, yet it is equally true that they have oftentimes lost sight of the welfare of the communities and ignored the rights of individuals.

We know that when they have found it necessary or expedient from a view-point of business to favor certain localities or certain shippers with discriminatory rates, they have not hesitated so to do.

Large shippers dictate the price at which their product shall be carried. This unrighteous dictation has for its most striking example that fungous growth—the private car lines—which, at first encouraged and nurtured by the railroads, has so grown and thrived that the railroads themselves are to-day bound, gagged, and helpless in their grasp.

Mr. John L. Pickering, of Illinois, one of the most capable newspaper men of the West, spent a great amount of time and energy in compiling facts and figures for publication in connection with the recent investigation of this matter by the Illinois railroad and warehouse commission. In speaking of the evils of the "private car system," Mr. Pickering says:

> Eight railroads, including the principal systems doing business in Illinois, for the year ending June 30, 1904, make affidavit, through their general officers, that they paid to the owners of private car lines for the preceding twelve months the enormous sum of $2,000,000. This vast sum was charged to operating expenses in some cases.
> The private car "graft" is a companion of that other evil, "rebates returned to favored shippers."
> Instead of buying cars in which to transport the freight that is offered to them, the railroads pay a rental to a corporation not organized as a common carrier, but owning private freight cars. This rental is based on the number of miles the car travels over each line, and the price varies with the influence of the corporation owning the cars and the anxiety of the railroad to secure the business controlled by the car lines.
> PRIVATE CAR GRAFT.
> For example, the Chicago and Eastern Illinois presented the Armour car lines with only $4,553 in the year ending June 30, 1904, while the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy handed them $101,990. But the Burlington gave the Swift lines $64,573, Cudahy a total of $35,209, and Morris $14,427.
> The Illinois Central paid Armour $89,421, Swift $27,802, Cudahy $8,952, and Morris $5,807. The Big Four divided about even between the two kings, giving Armour $14,590 and Swift $13,817. With the Chicago and Northwestern Armour and Cudahy were the favorites, the first receiving a total of $50,820 and the latter $50,110, while Swift got only $25,987. The Rock Island's donation to the Armour lines was $89,443 and to the Swift lines $43,018.
> The Union Tank Line, a branch of the Standard Oil Company, received enormous sums from all lines for the use of its cars, the Burlington paying it over $33,000 and the Illinois Central nearly $23,000, while the Northwestern contributed $17,000, the Rock Island $15,700, and the Santa Fe nearly $21,000.
> I have not included in the Swift summary the amounts paid to the Continental Fruit Express, which is popularly supposed to be owned by the Swift Company. The Continental Fruit Express Company received from the Illinois Central $5,085, from the Northwestern $15,000, and from the Rock Island $27,425.
> BEEF TRUST OWNS 90 PER CENT.
> These private car lines—I refer particularly to the lines owned or controlled by the great beef trust—are called "the greatest trust in the world" in a series of interesting papers now appearing in Everybody's Magazine. It is estimated that there are 54,000 refrigerator cars in the country and that Armour owns 25 per cent of the total. Ninety per cent of the total are owned by the beef trust.
> The products shipped by railroads in cars owned by other corporations include fruit, live stock, provisions, oil, beer, molasses, coffee, furniture, asphalt, stone, coal, agricultural implements, soap, dairy products, poultry, and meats.
> The immense sums paid annually by Illinois railroads to these private car lines are worthy the attention of the State authorities. It must not be forgotten that the thousands of cars owned by this class of corporations pay no taxes to the State of Illinois. The State board of equalization made an attempt one year, I believe, to reach them, but did not succeed, because the effort was not serious or earnest.
> The capital stock of one or two stable car lines is mentioned in the reports of the board, but not real assessment is made against them. The stable car lines are included in the above total, and receive their share of the railroads' surplus. Some of the amounts paid to them for the last year are given herewith:
> Mather Stable Car Line: Chicago and Eastern Illinois, $26,187; Illinois Central, $11,009; Rock Island, $3,489.
> STREET'S CAR LINE.
> Street's Stable Car Line: Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe, $39,907; Chicago and Alton, $13,612; Burlington, $16,799; Illinois Central, $35,191; Big Four, $12,468; Northwestern, $26,535; Rock Island, $27,969.
> In treating this subject I have only considered eight Illinois roads. I have no present means of obtaining the statements of all the roads in Illinois.
> Eight Illinois systems paid $2,000,000 for private car service in one year.
> What did all the Illinois roads pay?
> Probably $8,000,000 or $10,000,000.
> The net earnings of the lines are reduced just that much, and the burdens upon the small shipper and country merchant are thereby increased.
> Let me summarize three elements that have entered into the cost of transporting freight during the past ten years in this State—elements that are ignored by the railroads themselves in estimating for the public the cost of transportation.
> THREE COSTLY LUXURIES.
> First. Overcharges returned to shippers—illegal rebates.
> Second. Bounties to private car lines, which ought not to be tolerated for a day. If the common carrier authorized by law to transport commodities is short of equipment, it should be compelled to purchase sufficient cars to handle the traffic that is offered.
> Third. Special classifications, commodity rates, and ruinously low tolls to favored shippers or communities.
> Here are three elements of dead expense in transporting freight in Illinois. And every one of them increases the tonnage and decreases the average amount received per ton per mile.
> These are important features in Illinois railroading. They have been entirely overlooked in discussing the question, so far as I have been able to learn. There is some palliation for neglecting them, however, for no one suspected that the rebate evil had grown to such proportions. The private car evil has been notorious for the past three years, yet it would astound a man outside the railroad circle to show him that $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 had been paid by Illinois roads in one year for a service that should be performed by the common carriers themselves.

While the owners of the private car lines and other large shippers are favored by lower rates, the small shipper, the man who can not ship by train-load lots, or even in car lots, or who lives at noncompetitive points, has been compelled to pay whatever was demanded by the carrier, in order that the great reduction or rebate given to the larger shipper might be recouped and no loss to the railroad result therefrom.

A rebate under the form of "icing charges," "damages to shipment," or in whatever guise it may be, is a form of unjust discrimination, and has for its result bankruptcy to individuals, stagnation to communities, and destruction to healthful competition.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one who believes in arraying class against class. I do not subscribe to that creed which tends to set friend against friend, or brother against brother. I do not condemn legitimate wealth, but the existence of those mammoth fortunes, secured by unfair competition and by unjust practices and favors; fortunes which in their accumulation have piled upon the scarred shoulders and bowed heads of the common people, burdens beyond their power to bear.

I maintain that we are now confronted with the duty of depriving the favored few who have waxed fat at the expense of the labor of the common people, of the power longer so to do; giving to each citizen of the land a "square deal;" affording to each an equal opportunity in the race of life; recognizing in legislation not only the rights and interests of the railroad magnate and capitalist, but the rights of the farmer, the laborer, the everyday honest, earnest citizen, they who form the bone and sinew of the nation; safeguarding by this legislation the interests of the man who, throughout the struggle of life, has been made to realize that—

> The path which leads to a loaf of bread
> Winds through the swamps of toil.

[Applause.]

It is the duty of this membership to go on record in favor of this bill, declaring the doctrine that no combination of corporate interest may ever become so powerful that they may disregard the law of the land; that the most humble citizen shall be entitled to and receive like treatment under like conditions at the hand of the common carriers, to the end that none may be discriminated against or oppressed.

Mr. Chairman, many speeches have been made upon this bill by Members distinguished both for service and ability. Some have pointed out alleged grave defects and insisted upon amendment to render the bill more effective. I take it that the bill under discussion is not so perfect in detail that it will afford a remedy for all the evils incident to the subject-matter. It is impossible to believe the bill meets all the demands. It would be almost a miracle were it so complete and perfect as to cover every present situation or future contingency; but, do the gentlemen contend that this membership could justify itself in rejecting it because, perchance, it may not be perfect in every part?

Upon the canvas of the centuries is a grand picture, framed and painted by the master artists of the world. For one hundred and thirty years, stroke by stroke, the warm and the beautiful colors have been laid thereon, until to-day we behold a nation's progress such as has never before been dreamed of men, or seen in all this time-scarred earth. Here some gnat has crawled across it, here and there some artist has daubed it, and again, at a different point, some political sign writer has used it as an advertising medium. What shall we do with the world's masterpiece? Destroy it? Run the brush of black paint over it to express despair? Paint it over with red as symbolizing our hatred? Ah, no! Where the gnats have defiled it; where the dauber has defaced it; where the political sign writer has marred its harmony and spoiled its outlines, we will draw the brush of obliteration over those parts alone, and in their stead, in brighter colors, with defter fingers, and broader conceptions of the good, the beautiful, and true, represent the spirit and genius of America and her institutions. [Applause.]

And, so, Mr. Chairman, let us adopt the pending measure, which is a step in the right direction, going far toward providing an equitable solution of the transportation problem confronting us; and, as time moves on and experience teaches, we will not destroy, but in wisdom and fairness draw the brush of obliteration through discovered imperfections, correcting and perfecting this measure until we shall have given both the railroads and the people a just and adequate law, which will at once amply protect all interests and give to every man, rich or poor, powerful or weak, to the fullest extent a "square deal." [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE].

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman, some Members who have arisen to speak on this question have been careful to express their fears that this bill goes too far. I desire to express my fear that this bill does not go far enough. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I wish to call attention just for a few moments to the noncompetitive condition of interstate railway traffic that makes this legislation necessary. There are two ways in which to regulate rates—one is through the manner undertaken in this bill and the other is by the natural competition that ought to exist between the common carriers of the country. I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Chairman, that if we had competition it would be the most effective and the best remedy that we could offer to the people of this country. I do not hesitate to say this: That if this legislation is to have the effect of putting our people to sleep and say to them that they can find a full remedy in this legislation and they may let competition be destroyed, it will be an evil day for this country when this bill becomes a law. We are told here that we should fear socialism, anarchy, and all of those evils. I wish to state this: That the men who insist upon turning the destinies of this country over to the so-called "captains of industry" that are responsible for the great railroad combinations and the destruction of competition, are the advance agents of socialism. They are bringing about a condition in this country that makes possible Government control and ownership; that makes possible all that we fear from socialism, and I agree that that condition is un-American and that if we ever do embark upon that sea it will mean a revolution. But, I repeat, the men who say that these claimed "captains of industry" ought to be allowed to control the commercial conditions of this country, that they ought to be unrestrained in bringing about these noncompetitive conditions, are the advanced agents of socialism, because they are making a condition that makes honest and patriotic men stand and think. What shall we do if we are forced to the choice between public ownership, where those in control, at least, have patriotic intentions—though inefficiency in public control may be conceded—if we are to choose between this public control and private control, where the prompting or the motive is personal greed, how will the American people settle the question? Our people are going to tear from their throats the hand of private monopoly. They can't do otherwise and retain a decent claim to being free American citizens.

Now, what is the situation in this country? To my mind this illustrates it: It is just like walking into many of the towns of this country where the State laws prohibit gambling, prohibit prostitution, and the violation of the Sunday law; and yet when you walk into that town you find it wide open—the law openly and notoriously violated. You go up to the prosecuting attorney, and what does he say to you? "Well, do you know anything personally?" You say, "Why, no; I see the things all around me; I know that this condition exists, and I want you to put into operation the machinery of the law in order to destroy this evil in this community." The prosecuting officer would wheel around in his chair and reply contemptuously: "Don't come to me without the proof." You go into a clothing store and talk with the merchant about it, and what is his reply? It is, "I sell clothes to these fellows. It is business; let it alone." Go into a furniture store and they say, "These are good buyers. They buy fine furniture. Let them alone." And also you soon find out that corrupt politics is responsible.

That reflects a condition in this nation to-day with regard to these illegal combinations. Every man in this House that I have talked to on this subject knows that this condition exists; that these illegal combinations right under the shadow of the Capitol are carrying on their work of destroying competition between the common carriers of this country. We all know it. When you suggest putting into motion the machinery of the law, what are you met with? "Party!" "My party will be injured." Mr. Chairman, in all the corruption revealed lately in bossism and insurance scandal, what do you see? The politician and captain of industry locked in each other's arms—both drunk; one on ambition for place in the financial world; the other for place in the political world. They say, "Look here, you will injure the prospects of our party; you will destroy business; you will unsettle business conditions. Let us alone."

Why, look at the reports sent in here yesterday evening by the President from the Interstate Commerce Commission. It clearly reveals the necessity for instant action on the part of the Government. I will here insert the report. I say it is an insult for those in control of the power of this great Government to allow these things to continue without putting into motion the enginery at their command in the interest of competition and for the purpose of destroying these enemies of the American people.

I will incorporate as a part of my remarks the facts that I believe would be revealed if this House were to offer a thorough investigation of that condition of affairs in this country.

1. That the railroads carrying bituminous coal to the Atlantic ports of the Pennsylvania Railroad, New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad, Norfolk and Western Railway Company, and the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad.

2. That the board of directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company is composed of a majority of persons who are directors or officers or both of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the New York Central Railroad Company.

3. That the majority of the board of directors of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company are persons in the interest of or under the control of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

4. That a majority of the board of directors of the Norfolk and Western Railway Company is composed of persons who are officers or directors or both of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

5. That a very large part of the stock of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, and sufficient to practically control that company, is owned by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and by the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad Company, which in turn is owned by the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company.

6. That a very large part of the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company, and sufficient, with that owned by affiliated interests, to control the company, is owned by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company or its subsidiary company or companies in which it is interested or controls, and by the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, and it is believed that investigation will develop some understanding, agreement, or arrangement between the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company for the control of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company.

7. It is believed that an investigation will show that a very large proportion of the capital stock, and sufficient to practically control, if not, in fact, a majority of the stock, of the Norfolk and Western Railway Company is held by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company or its subsidiary companies, or companies, railroad or otherwise, in which it is interested or controls.

8. It is believed that investigation will show that a majority of the stock, or at least an interest operating to control the management, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is owned by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company or its subsidiary companies, or companies, railroad or otherwise, which it is interested in or controls.

9. It is believed that investigation will show that the above-indicated common control of the bituminous-coal-carrying roads has resulted in the allotment to each coal-carrying road of certain territory to be served by it with bituminous coal, and that the railroads carrying bituminous coal are prevented from allowing the above coal-carrying roads to compete with each other in the markets by means of rate adjustments, agreements, and combinations.

10. It is believed that such investigation will show that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the New York Central Railroad Company, by means of their influence through their stock ownership aforesaid and representation upon the several boards of the other railroad companies, have prevented coal from the Norfolk and Western Railway and Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad from being offered in the markets of Washington and New York, or anywhere on the Atlantic coast above the Virginia capes, except in New England, and thus competition between railroads carrying bituminous coal to Atlantic shores has been destroyed.

11. It is believed that it will further develop that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has the power to curtail shipments at any time from the territory served by the Baltimore and Ohio and Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company and the Norfolk and Western Railway Company, and thus destroy competition between the coals from the bituminous fields of Pennsylvania and the coals from the bituminous fields of West Virginia.

12. It is believed that upon investigation it will be shown that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, through stock ownership or otherwise, is interested in or owns a majority of the coal carried over its line from points in West Virginia, and that the officers of said company, or those in the employ of said company and charged with the distribution of cars or furnishing facilities to shippers, are interested in coal companies or coal operations along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, by reason of its interest or the interest of its officers or agents in preventing competition with coal companies in which it is interested, or in the product of which the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company or its agents or officers are interested, declines to allot fair proportion of cars or give to independent shippers, and declines to allow any new company or person (independent of the companies in which it or its officers are interested) to open up new mines and to become shippers over the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and thereby destroys competition.

13. It is believed that investigation would show that the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and officers of such company are interested in coal companies mining and shipping coal over the line of said railroad, and that coal mines in which the officers or agents of the company are interested are furnished cars and facilities for shipment far in excess of what they are entitled to upon any fair and equitable distribution.

14. Almost all of the coal traffic aforesaid is interstate traffic.

Those of you who fear governmental control, if you are honest in it you will favor this investigation; if you are not honest in it, you will not only oppose the legislation seeking Federal control but you will oppose any legislation seeking to get at the facts for the purpose of breaking up and destroying the noncompetitive condition of the interstate commerce of this country.

What are they doing? Turn your eyes toward the coal fields. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] told the House in his speech here yesterday what the conditions are as to coal in Ohio; but go to West Virginia, go to Pennsylvania, go to the coal regions and find what high-handed schemes these plunderers have resorted to, and how they are holding up the great American consumers of this necessary article, coal. They have even laid out the territory. One of these captains of industry can go up to a certain line; down to that line another captain comes. They are fixing the prices. They are destroying the independent coal miners, and these people are organizing and seeking relief from the powers that be.

It is not a party question, but it is the question of all questions. No honest man can lay it to the principles of the party founded by Abraham Lincoln and the statesmen of his day; nor can it be attributed to the principles of the Democracy of this nation. God knows you can not mention Democracy and this unlawful combination in the same breath. But corrupt politics is responsible. What are they doing? Not only the coal industry is under their grasp, but the steel industry.

Now, we want to buy rails to build a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama. What would we pay for them? Here is Mr. Ramsey's statement before the Senate investigating committee, where he says:

> Why, Europe will lay us down steel rails at American ports of entry for $20 a ton, but the tariff of $8 a ton makes us pay $28; and if we buy right at the factory rails for use in Canada, we get those rails at the same place for $20 or $21 a ton, and yet when we buy these identical rails to build a railroad in America we have got to pay $28.

Now, it is revealed that the Government is paying this steel trust $26.45 a ton. It is true that is less by the difference between that and $28 than the home consumer of that product would be required to pay, but yet it is $6.45 more the Government of the United States is paying to this enormous trust—$6.45 more for the identical product than the very concern will sell to a foreign purchaser.

That is the condition; and yet when this great problem of rate legislation is up in this House and a remedy far too mild, in my opinion, is being discussed—too mild because I do not believe the provisions of this bill are coextensive with the evil it undertakes to handle—I believe the Commission ought to have power conferred to handle what is called the "relation of rates" over the differential. Why is not that power included in this bill? Why, the bill appears upon its face to give that power, but the report from the committee says the bill on its face is a misstatement, that the power is not conferred in the bill. Yet, Mr. Chairman, when this mild remedy is up, the railroads leading to the great Atlantic States have whispered this: "You eastern fellows better look out; the South and West are trying to rob you." The southern railroads have come to us with the identical proposition, only they state: "You of the South look out; these easterners are going to rob you." We hear this suspicion, which is injected into this problem by the railroads themselves, expressed by Members on this floor: "Look out! Watch out! The fellow down South is trying to destroy your industries—trying to ruin your country." We of the South are told, "Look out! The men from the East are trying to rob your country." Is not that the argument made before the committees by the presidents and officers of these different railroad systems? And yet that damnable, cowardly fear or suspicion is reflected upon the floor of this House to that extent that men are absolutely afraid to put that power in this bill that ought to be here for the purpose of doing exact and entire justice toward this entire country. [Loud applause.]

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], if his speech is properly reported in the Washington Post this morning, says this: "Within two weeks gentlemen favoring the pending bill had told him they hoped, through the control of the differential given in the bill, to destroy the cotton industries of New England in favor of those industries located nearer to the raw material." If a Member from the South made that suggestion, he himself, in my opinion, is an enemy of the legislation, and he was trying to create this devlish suspicion in the mind of this Easterner. I can speak for the people of my district. They are not enemies of railroads; they are patriotic, loyal citizens of this country, and they do not want to destroy the business of New England, but they have the common instincts of self-preservation that belong to every man. They know that their interests would be safer; that more justice would be dealt out to them from the hands of a tribunal, put there and sworn—intelligent men—with no personal interest in the outcome, but standing there to do justice. That is all that my people want, and they ought to have that. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS].

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, the pending measure is beyond question the most important that will be considered by the Fifty-ninth Congress. Whether it be viewed in the light of the public interest that it has evoked, the great and almost universal demand for some remedial legislation along its lines, or the important and far-reaching effects which must certainly follow its passage and fair administration, it is without doubt the one supreme and overshadowing issue of the hour. The transportation question is the greatest industrial problem confronting the people of America or any other country. Transportation is the life of commerce, and the utilities by which it is carried on are the arteries through which the lifeblood of traffic and business flows. Just in the same proportion that transportation is developed, facilities multiplied, and highways bettered and increased, the general business and prosperity of the whole country advances. The existence of safe, convenient, and economical means of carriage will rapidly develop any section or industry, while the denial of these conveniences, or the imposition of charges unjust, unreasonable, or greater than the traffic can bear, will, of necessity and inexorably, destroy those who suffer under them.

Modern transportation has practically resolved itself into two methods and two alone—rail and water. Because of the fact that a great part of the country is interior and is not penetrated by navigable rivers or other streams, the railroads furnish the only means of carriage to this great area, and as to inland transportation generally, they are largely the greatest and most important factor. I shall waste no time here on the proposition that railroads are from their very nature monopolies. The public is of necessity restricted in the matter of patronage to those lines which have been established, and which, in the nature of things, are restricted in number. That they are public highways is too firmly embedded in the jurisprudence of this country to admit of doubt. It is only necessary to refer for a moment to their origin to understand how and why, early in their history, they were so denominated by law. The original railway was simply a track or roadbed with rails, over which any person had the right of passage, with their vehicles of carriage suited to its style and character, upon the payment of reasonable tolls for the use thereof. It was open to all the public and each had an equal right to use it upon the payment to the owner of a reasonable toll. None could be excluded, and the charges, as well as all other charges for the use of all public utilities, were, by common law, required to be just and reasonable. In the evolution of this important and greatest factor in the transportation problem, the owners of the highways extended their ownership not only to the highways, but to the vehicles of carriage, by providing their own vans, cars, and motive power, until it culminated in the modern system in which not only the roadbed, track, and rails, but also all of the equipment and motive power necessary and incidental to its use are owned by the carrier.

In this evolution from the primitive to the modern railway we must not lose sight of the fact that with the coming of the ownership and control of the cars and the equipment by the carrier, there came with it an incidental right to the exclusive use of its roadbed and tracks, and the right to exclude any and every other person therefrom. As a necessary incident to this change and to this right of exclusion, it follows that not only the roadbed, track, and rails, but also all of the conveniences and paraphernalia used in connection with the carriage over this public highway, of which the owner possessed a monopoly, were also impressed with the public use, and the character of a public highway became stamped not only upon the road itself, but upon all the utilities incident to it.

Nor will I more than pause upon the proposition that all public highways, and for that matter all public utilities of every character, have been from time immemorial, because of their quasi public nature and of the fact that they were to a great extent monopolies, the subject of governmental regulation and control. As above indicated, their charges have always been by law required to be reasonable, and anything in excess of reasonable tolls and compensation has been by law extortion. While this is true, it is also true that, until the passage of the railroad supervision acts in the various States and by Congress, the carrier had, or at least exercised, an unlimited right to fix his charge, the only remedy of the shipper and the public being an appeal to the courts for redress against the payment of any given charge on the ground that the same was excessive and extortionate. Many years ago it became manifest that this remedy was insufficient and did not meet the requirements of the increased and rapidly multiplying trade, and because of that fact and of the need for a better and more satisfactory method, and in response to a great public demand, the various States of the Union began to adopt laws providing for the supervision and regulation, by commission and otherwise, of the charges and practices of common carriers, and finally, in 1887, the interstate-commerce law was passed. Nearly twenty years' experience with that act has demonstrated that while great good has been accomplished by and under it, and while it has done much, not only to regulate the tolls and usages of the carriers and to bring about a better agreement and understanding as to rates by both the public and the roads, it is still insufficient, and the points on which it fails to present a cure, for evils which all concede exist, are well known and understood. It is to meet these conceded insufficiencies of the present law, and in response to a demand, greater and more universal perhaps than was ever made upon this body by the public on any one proposition in the history of our Government, that this measure has been presented, and in considering the questions involved in its passage it may be well to resort to the method laid down by law books for construing statutes, viz, to examine the old law, the mischief, and the remedy.

Briefly stated, the law of 1887, as amended by the act of 1889, declared who were common carriers and what common carriers should be subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission; provided that all persons should be treated alike and served upon the same conditions and for the same price; prohibited discriminations and rebates; required that all schedules or tariffs of fares and charges should be made public and open to the inspection of all; prohibited any changes in the said schedules, except upon ten days' notice in case of an advance and three days' notice in case of a reduction; forbade poolings and combinations, and provided for a review by the Commission created by the act, upon a complaint made to it, of any rate, charge, or tariff made by a carrier, and of any practice, regulation, or custom in the transaction of its business. These are, succinctly stated, the salient features of the present interstate-commerce law. I have not essayed to do more than to state them in the most concise terms possible, because the scope and effect of the act is well known, not only to this body but to the public at large.

It will be noted that I have stated that the Commission possesses the right to review any rate fixed and to make an order requiring the carrier to desist from charging the said rate, or to desist from pursuing the practice complained of, but I would not leave this subject without further remarking in passing that for many years after the formation of the Commission that body claimed, and indeed exercised, and the public generally understood that it possessed, the right not only to declare that a given rate was unjust and unreasonable, but in the same order to prescribe what rate was reasonable for a given service, and to require that the carrier should in future conform himself thereto to the extent of not exceeding the charge found by the Commission to be reasonable. The existence of that power in the Commission was finally denied by the Supreme Court of the United States, and it is, in my judgment, because of this denial, and because of the fact that by it the Commission has been practically emasculated of authority over rates, that the present and universal demand for an enlargement and perfection of its powers has grown up.

Having stated the present condition of the law, let us for a moment dwell upon the existing evils and mischiefs which we are called upon to remedy. As just stated, the lack of power in the Commission to declare a just and reasonable rate is the one most complained of. In the present condition of things the shipper makes his complaint to the Commission that a given rate, charge, or practice is unjust, excessive, extortionate, or unreasonable. The matter is inquired into, and at the end of an elaborate, exhaustive, and expensive hearing, the Commission finds that the complaint is well founded and the rate or practice excessive and unreasonable. The complainant has had his day in court and has won his case, but has accomplished nothing by his victory. An order is made to the carrier requiring him to desist from charging the rate assailed, but that order is of no effect except as an admonition to the offender. He is not bound to obey it if he is willing to take the risk of a lawsuit, and as I shall proceed further in this discussion to show, that risk, while theoretically dangerous, is, in practical operation, nil.

The Commission possesses no powers to enforce its decrees by any process whatever, and if the carrier remains obdurate or contumacious the only remedy is by a suit instituted in the circuit court of the United States by the Commission to enforce its orders, and the complainant must try over again, at great expense and delay, the case which he has already fully thrashed out before the tribunal specially constituted to try and determine the question at issue. In the meantime he is being subjected to the excessive charge, and when the judgment finally comes, if, indeed, it is ever reached, it in all probability finds him either dead, bankrupt, or out of business.

But let us suppose, on the other hand, that the carrier is not willing to risk litigation with the Commission and at the same time is not willing to yield substantial compliance with the order and put in a reasonable rate. In that case it is only necessary for him to reduce the rate which has been condemned by the smallest fraction, thereby obeying the letter but not the spirit of the order, and promulgate a new rate an infinitesimal fraction smaller than the rate prohibited, and the shipper, if he desires any substantial relief, is compelled to go again to the Commission with a complaint that the new rate, while a shade smaller, is really as unreasonable as the old, and try his case over and over again ad infinitum, or as often as the carrier may by these transparent but perfectly competent tactics delay him of his redress and his rights.

But, again, let us assume that the carrier has refused to obey the order and the Commission has instituted its suit and prosecuted it to a decree, the court upholding the order of the Commission and declaring the rate assailed to be unreasonable and excessive, and reiterating the Commission's order that the carrier should desist any longer from charging or collecting it, the court, under the present law, is as powerless as the Commission to say what rate the carrier shall in future charge, and nothing substantial has been gained except that the old rate has been stopped. The carrier may obey and put in a new rate, one-eighth, one-tenth, or one-hundredth part of a cent lower than the one enjoined by the courts, and absolutely no relief can be had, as there is nothing to be done except to begin anew before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Let me stress this point and make it clear beyond misunderstanding. Under the law as it now stands there is no power anywhere except to enjoin a given rate, and after that is done the carrier may comply with the order by the slightest and most insignificant reduction in his tariffs, leaving the party injured utterly without redress and with only a barren and fruitless victory. Manifestly the present law, in so far as it seeks to remedy the evil of excessive rates, only "keeps the word of promise to our ear, and breaks it to our hope."

That there are many excessive rates and evil practices of this character which ought to be remedied is admitted. I have heard no gentleman who has addressed the committee on this subject on either side of the debate deny the existence of these evils. The only point at issue in all of this discussion seems to be the remedy.

It is apparent that the common-law remedy of a suit to recover the excess paid over a reasonable rate is entirely inadequate and insufficient. A sufficient answer to any suggestion of the adequacy of the common law is the fact that while it is conceded that millions of cases of excessive charges exist, it is practically impossible to find a single case of a recovery. The truth is that a suit for such overcharge is too tedious and fraught with too much expense, delay, and uncertainty to be regarded for a moment as a practical or practicable remedy.

The provisions of the act of 1887 I have shown, or attempted to show, are insufficient to meet the case, and the only remedy that remains or that is worthy of consideration is to vest in some body or commission the power to fix a rate beyond which the carrier may not go, but within which he may fix his charges to suit himself.

I am aware of all the objections that are urged to this method of supervision, but none of them seem to me to be sufficient to prevail over the urgent necessity for legislation and the crying need for relief. It is insisted that it would be unwise to make the railroad commission the general freight agents for all the railroads in the country, and with this idea I am in full accord, but the manifest reply to that complaint is that this bill does not provide, and it has never been seriously insisted, at least in this body, that the Commission should be given the initiative in rate making or the power to initiate freight schedules for any or all the roads. It is not contemplated that this Commission shall, upon the passage of this act, take up the rate schedules of the railroads for revision and promulgate new schedules in their stead. The bill under consideration does not give the Commission jurisdiction, of its own motion, to revise generally the schedules and tariffs of the carriers. Its scope on that point is merely to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission, in cases where complaint has been made before it and where after a full and fair hearing it is determined that a rate charged is unreasonable or more than it ought to be, to vitalize the order which it makes to require the carrier to desist from charging the unlawful rate by providing a reasonable rate, beyond which the carrier may not in the future, or until the further order of the Commission, go.

It is to be observed that this right exists only in cases where complaint has been lodged before the Commission and where the Commission has, after acting upon the complaint, found the charge to be excessive and commanded its discontinuance. It is manifest that this power, and nothing short of this power, will cure the evils to which we have before alluded and remedy the deficiencies in the present law.

But it is objected that the Commission while perfectly competent to say that a certain rate is unreasonable is not competent to say what charge is reasonable. This, to my mind, is nonsense and fallacy too apparent to be answered. If a body is competent to say that a given rate is too high, it is of necessity competent to determine what is the highest rate that would be reasonable and permissible. The finding that a given rate is too high of necessity comprehends a decision that it is above the point at which reason ceases and extortion begins, and in order to find what is unreasonable we must first find what is reasonable, and then that the given figure exceeds that point. In other words, the finding that a rate is unreasonable can not be made until the body which makes the decision has found what is a reasonable rate. The same mental operation which ascertains the fact that a given rate is unreasonable ascertains and fixes, at least in the mind, what is reasonable and proper for the service.

Again it is contended that the power to revise rates and determine what is a reasonable or unreasonable rate ought not to be lodged in the Commission, but in some other body. I submit that this is equally unreasonable and fallacious. The power must be lodged somewhere. It is apparent, nay conceded, that there must be some restraining, supervising hand to shape and direct the charges of these public agencies so that they may not become unreasonable. It is useless to argue that these things will regulate themselves; that like other matters of commerce and trade they will adjust themselves, as it were, automatically, by the law of competition and the commendable strife and emulation for success. The fact that competition in railroading has practically disappeared, that consolidations are daily occurring, and that the vastly greater part of the railroad interests in this country are in the hands of a comparatively few, disposes of all idea of regulation by competition and brings us sharply face to face with the proposition that as all regulation by competition is passing the demand, nay, the absolute necessity, for governmental regulation for these now relative monopolies, which are fast becoming absolute, is imperative, both for the protection of the people and of the monopolies themselves. I say for the monopolies themselves because I believe that unless some wise, adequate, and effective provision for the supervision of common carriers is enacted into law, and into a law which will prove effective and satisfactory in its administration, the demand for governmental ownership of these utilities will be so great it will be impossible for this Government to resist it. If I had no other reason for the support of this bill, and I have them in abundance, this fear of Government ownership of railroads, to my mind a calamity too great to be contemplated, would be sufficient to compel me to give it the weight of my voice, my influence, and my vote.

What governing body can be more safely trusted to pass upon a reasonable rate after a fair, full, and complete hearing than a commission of high-class men, selected not only because of their knowledge of the law, but also because of their fitness for this particular work, and whose sole duty it is to deal with these questions of transportation and with them alone? And the fact that the Commission is to be an absolutely nonpartisan body, divided almost equally between the two great political parties, that their terms are long, that the salaries provided by the pending bill is sufficient to attract the service of the best men in the country are additional guaranties of the wisdom, conservatism, and patriotism that ought to, and we believe will, characterize their findings and decisions.

The rate-fixing power has been possessed and exercised by nearly every State railroad commission in the country in a much broader measure than here conferred. I know of no State where the exercise of this power has seriously damaged the railroads, and I have heard no intimation at any time during this debate that such is the case. In my own State this jurisdiction has existed and been exercised for over twenty years, and yet our greatest era of railroad building and progress has been since 1884. Surely this should answer all objections along this line.

Difficulty in the administration of a law does not furnish a sufficient reason against its passage. It may be persuasive to a certain extent where the necessity for remedial legislation is not, as in this case, great and overwhelming. The human factor must enter into every equation where law is concerned, and all laws of every sort must be administered by human beings. So long as beings are human some mistakes, inaccuracies, and, mayhap, injustices will arise in their administration. This however, furnishes no reason why we should abandon law. We can do nothing except by the interposition of human agencies, and because humanity has not been brought to the point of perfection does not excuse us from adopting legislation that is needed. This matter can not be committed to any agency except man, and I respectfully submit that the provisions of this bill offer every guaranty that can be conceived to secure an able, honest, and efficient body.

The second evil which I will notice—and it is akin to the one which I have just discussed—is that of private car lines, a subject that has been so much in the public eye for the past several years, so thoroughly discussed in all the prints of the country, and so thoroughly ventilated in the hearings before the House and Senate Committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that I deem it unnecessary to do more than mention it in passing. Everyone knows how they grew up and the history of their development, and everyone equally knows how their pernicious practices have outraged not only the shippers, but the carriers themselves. They deny that under the present law they are subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission and can be regulated by it, and it is apparent that something should be done, and that vigorously and effectually, to prevent their further encroachments.

Not the least objectionable feature of these instrumentalities of commerce as they are at present administered—and it is with their administration rather than their existence that I deal—is the fruitful source and opportunity which they offer for rebates and unlawful concessions, favoring one shipper at the expense of the other, the most pernicious and inexcusable of all the evils that now surround the question of transportation. They should and must be corrected.

Terminals and switch tracks are also convenient devices under which to conceal rebates, and they, too, are, and should be, made the subject of legislation and regulation.

I turn now to the present bill and will try to point out where it remedies the evils existing under the present law, as I see and conceive them.

Section 1 amends the corresponding section of the existing interstate-commerce act so as to include within the term "railroad," as used in the act, and subject to the supervision of the Commission and to all the provisions of law, "all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of the persons or property," and "all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary, etc.," and all "cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported; and it shall be the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of this act to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and to establish through routes and just and reasonable rates applicable thereto."

To my mind this effectually includes the private car lines, switch tracks, and terminals, affords a fair guaranty for their supervision and proper regulation, and, in a great measure, if not entirely, provides for existing evils so far as they are concerned. It strikes a blow at rebating in that it puts their charges under the supervision of the Commission, provides for publicity, and gives that body an opportunity to correct any inequalities and improper practices.

Section 2 of the pending bill amends section 6 of the present law so as to require all classifications to contain, in addition to all transportation and terminal charges, all icing and other charges incident to the manipulation of private cars, and, in fine, all other charges of every nature whatever which the Commission may see fit to require to be published. This is a further guaranty against oppression, abuse, and rebates by private car lines and similar agencies.

The section is further amended by providing that no change whatever, either by way of increase or decrease, shall be made except upon thirty days' notice. The same provisions are made with reference to joint rates as are specified as to single tariffs.

These changes are manifestly aimed not only at excessive charges, but also at the practice of giving rebates under various guises. It is well known that a practice has grown up by which certain carriers have by secret arrangements granted special concessions to certain of their shippers in the shape of agreements that they would at a given time make and promulgate a reduction in their rates, which reduction was to exist only for a short time, but long enough to enable the favored shipper to move such of his freight as he desired under the reduced rate.

The fact that the rate was changed was to be known and was actually known to but few. It is true that the Commission was notified, but practically at the same time it was notified of the reduction it was advised that the rate would be raised at a given date, and this was in reality a special rate given only to the favored one or few who were notified in advance, in order that they might assemble their freight and take advantage of the reduction. Only three days' notice of a reduction is required by the existing law, and in this way the consummation of the unlawful scheme was perfectly easy. The present bill requiring thirty days' notice will render any such practices impossible.

Section 4 amends section 15 so as to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power in any case where, after a hearing upon a complaint filed, it has been found that the rate complained of is unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of this act, not only to declare that the said rate is unlawful and direct the carrier to desist therefrom, but also to fix a rate or practice which is fair, just, and reasonable under the circumstances of the case, which rate shall not thereafter be exceeded by the carrier. Or if it be a regulation which is the subject of the order, the regulation as prescribed by the Commission shall be conformed to by the carrier. These orders shall go into effect thirty days after notice, and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier until or unless suspended or set aside by the Commission, or suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. In cases of joint rates, where the carriers can not agree among themselves, the Commission is authorized to fix divisions between them.

The Commission is authorized to create through lines of carriage and through routes upon complaint and after hearing wherever, in their discretion, they are necessary. This section specifically provides that if an owner of any property transported shall himself perform any service toward its transportation or carriage the charge therefor shall be no more than a fair compensation for the service or a fair proportion of the whole rate.

By section 6 the orders of the Commission are put into effect within thirty days, and provision is made for the institution of suit by the carrier to set aside or suspend such order, and severe penalties for any violation of the orders of the Commission are provided.

It is unnecessary for me to discuss the effect of these provisions at any great length. I have heretofore shown that some legislation of this character is necessary and how and why such provisions would meet the evils which confessedly exist at this time. The bill as presented by the committee is, on this point at least, full and complete; indeed, it may be said it is in some respects drastic, but it is believed, and I concur in the belief, that it will meet the exigencies of the case and remedy many of the evil practices which have grown up and flourished under the law as it now is.

In order to meet the increased labor which has been placed upon the Commission by this measure, the number of the members is increased from five to seven and the salaries to $10,000 each. The wisdom of these provisions will be apparent. As the Commission often sits in several places at the same time, they will be enabled by the increase in their numbers to cover more territory and to perform this duty more satisfactorily. Men who are called upon to deal with the intricate questions which will arise in the investigation and determination of controversies between carriers and the people should possess the highest ability and receive the most liberal compensation.

The bill reported is the product of much study, investigation, and consideration by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. During the last session of Congress exhaustive hearings were held and the Senate committee took evidence long into the vacation. This measure is the product of the best ability and judgment of our committee and is reported unanimously by that body. It goes without saying it would be very difficult, if not practically impossible, for anybody to agree upon a bill that would suit the varying ideas of each Member of this House. I can not say that if I, following my own ideas as to the way to reach the evils which I have endeavored to point out, were drawing a bill that I would draw one exactly along the lines of that presented here. There are some lines along which I believe I would go farther and some perhaps in which I would not desire to be so drastic. I confess that I believe I would have extended the right of resort to the courts and that the bill carries some penalties which seem to me to be severe, and perhaps harsh, but in the consideration of that matter I am reminded that penalties may always be escaped by an obedience to the law and by refraining from doing the thing upon which the penalty is visited.

Again, in the matter of rebates I would have restored the former law punishing such practices by imprisonment. So long as the only risk taken by the shipper is the payment of a money penalty, which in many instances would be less than the amount received by him in the shape of a rebate, and so long as the carrier may bid for business by secret and dishonest competition at the expense of his fairer neighbor who is seeking to obey the law, risking only the loss of a sum of money which may or may not be equal in amount to that which he has gained by the unlawful act, it will be found that both will be willing to take the chance, because as a rule it will be found that after deducting the penalty they have only disgorged a portion of their ill-gotten gains. If, however, in addition to this they risk incarceration for a suitable term and the contract is made void in the sense that a rebate so unlawfully paid may be recovered in a suit by the carrier who paid it, or in case he fails within a reasonable time to sue for it, by the Government in a suit instituted in its name by the district attorney, the shipper as well as the carrier will pause before he takes the risk of a violation of the law.

It is especially fitting that the money so unlawfully paid should be recovered by the Government. It is well known that many who control large shipments practically put their business up for sale, declaring that they will give it to him who pays the highest rake-off or rebate. The railroad manager, who is but the servant of his corporate employer and who must get business, achieve success, and show results or lose his position, seeing or feeling that those around him and who are his competitors are getting business which is offered him for the granting of a rebate and which he can not obtain except by conforming to such unlawful demand, is, to my mind, much less to blame if he yields to the coercion of the shipper in order to get a portion of the business for his line than the man who, owning the tonnage, invites a violation of the law and announces practically that no one can obtain his patronage except at the price of becoming a law breaker and engaging in an unlawful practice for his benefit and advantage.

I think this bill could be materially strengthened by such provisions as I have suggested by requiring the imprisonment of the offender in every case of rebating and by directing, as a part of the penalty against him who sought and obtained the rebate and in addition to the other penalties fixed by law, that the ill-gotten gains should be paid over to the court for the benefit of the Government. Such a provision would, in my judgment, go farther toward stopping these practices than anything that I have heard suggested either upon this floor or elsewhere.

The honest shipper who seeks to obey the law and who is not looking for an unfair advantage over his competitor is first to be considered in this matter of rebates. If his neighbor has an advantage over him in freight rates, by rebate or otherwise, he can undersell him in the market, and mayhap drive him out of business and to ruin. Let the conditions between the two be equalized by taking from the violator of law, not only the penalty for the broken statute, but also the fruits of the unlawful adventure.

This is a great and important question and should be approached in a spirit not only of conservatism and patriotism, but of justice to the railroads as well as to the public. No other factor has contributed so much to the development of America as have the railroads. The great West, with all its boundless resources and wealth, could never have been connected with the balance of the United States except through the medium of these swift-winged messengers of commerce and carriage. My own State, and particularly the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor, owes much in the matter of the development of its resources to the railroads and the recent railroad building in my own section, making marketable the vast wealth of timber and the great agricultural resources of that part of the State; and the consequent cheapening and increasing of the means of carriage, not only of the products out but of the necessities in, have more than any other factor contributed to the splendid prosperity, now high in its zenith, which now blesses my own people.

He who approaches this problem with the idea that the carriers are all thieves and plunderers, bent only upon drawing from the territory which they serve the last available penny and the last available ounce of substance, will fall as far short of comprehending the true merits of the question as he who treats the just demands of the public for legislation along the lines that I have pointed out as the cry of the socialist and demagogue. The situation as it exists, and which I deplore, is the result in many cases of environment, of conditions and surroundings, and in others of the natural tendencies of human nature striving for supremacy in business, which the experience of all the ages demonstrates should be restrained and regulated by the supervising hand of government.

As was well remarked by the eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], we of America have been much inclined to enthrone success and to magnify and glorify him who outstrips his fellows in the commendable strife for the lead. The dominant spirit of Americanism and the desire to excel has done much to bring about the conditions which now exist, and in addition to all this there always has been and always will be a disposition in human nature to seek the shortest route to success and to profit, if necessary, at the expense of others, which must and can only be defeated by suitable and sufficient provisions of law. In my judgment the measure now under discussion will prove suitable and sufficient. As a whole it meets my approval. I regard it as a step, a considerable and effective step, in the matter of a very much needed reform in railway-rate legislation, and because it will, in my judgment, accomplish much if fairly and properly administered, and because it is the only bill on that subject that I will have an opportunity to vote for or against, I shall cast my vote for it and cheerfully accord it my support. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, much has been said of the danger of the proposed railroad legislation. Gentlemen, in their dread of the direful results that are to follow from what they call this novel departure, have allowed themselves at times to be carried literally off their feet by the hysteria of eloquence or fright. Is it true that this is a novel departure? Is it true that in proposing to regulate the rates charged by a common carrier or the tolls upon a public highway we are for the first time wandering off in the devious ways of populism and anarchy?

Why, Mr. Chairman, the doctrine of this bill is as old as the common law itself. For centuries the right of the legislature, and the right of the courts, to place restrictions upon those who operate a public highway has been acknowledged and enforced. A railroad is inherently and in every sense a public highway—nothing more and nothing less. It is a common carrier; it is a public servant, and because it happens to be worth in all of its ramifications $16,000,000,000, it is none too big still to be a public servant of the American people. [Applause.] It is governed by the law that governs the public servant and the public highway. From time immemorial the courts and legislatures have taken jurisdiction of tolls charged upon highways or exacted by ferries, where the other side of the question was presented and the carrier discharged a public function. There is no difference in law, there is no difference in morals, between the legislature of a State saying to a man operating a ferry upon a river half a mile wide, "You shall charge no more than a certain sum for carriage of persons and teams across that stream," and saying to a man who operates a locomotive along a few miles of steel rails, "You shall only charge so much and no more for transportation of passengers and freight."

"A railroad established and existing under an act or charter of incorporation, like a turnpike or a plank road, is a public highway, but only to be used in a different mode." (Angel on Highways, p. 13.)

A great jurist of Massachusetts has thus stated this elementary principle:

"We think that a turnpike road is a public highway, established by public authority for public use, and is to be regarded as public easement. The only difference between this and a common highway is, instead of being made at the public expense at the first instance, it is authorized and laid out by public authority and made at the expense of individuals at the first instance; and the cost of construction and maintenance is reimbursed by a toll levied by public authority for the purpose Every traveler has the same right to use it, paying the toll established by law, as he would have to do to use any other public highway." (Commonwealth v. Wilkinson, 16 Pick., p. 175.)

If it was necessary for the protection of the public that the old turnpike road and the frail boat propelled by oars should be under the wise supervision of the law, a jurisdiction unquestioned for centuries, in order that one individual should not be preferred to another, and that all, upon the payment of a just and reasonable compensation therefor, should receive fair and absolutely impartial treatment, with how much more force does the reasoning and the rule apply where the highway, by virtue of its vast extent, and the carrier, by reason of its colossal wealth and power, are necessarily vested with a practical monopoly, and with infinite capacity for mischief if it betrays or perverts its manifest duty to the thousands of helpless shippers along its right of way, as said in Tiff v. Southern Rwy. Co. (123 Fed. Rep., 789–791):

> It has been from time immemorial the basic obligation of a common carrier to receive and transport all goods offered, upon receiving reasonable compensation * * * having undertaken that duty, it was settled by the common law that the common carrier must carry for all to the extent of its capacity, without unjust or unreasonable discrimination, either in charges or in the facilities for actual transportation.

And, further:

> If this was true at common law, how much stronger is the obligation upon those vast public corporations of modern times, which, in consideration of valuable franchises granted by the public, are engaged in the stupendous business of transporting freight and passengers? So universal is the reliance of the public upon these instrumentalities of modern commerce that their operation is indispensable to the very existence of our modern social life.

Jeremiah Black, twenty years ago, in the greatest effort of his life, completely exploded the time-worn sophistry that a corporation can exercise an absolute and unrestricted control over a public highway simply because it may own the means by which that highway is operated. He declared in an address, delivered before the judiciary committee of the Pennsylvania legislature in 1883, that—

On the other hand, the corporations deny that they owe any responsibility to the State more than individuals engaged in private business. They assert that the management of the railroads being a mere speculation of their own, these thoroughfares of trade and travel must be run for their interests, without regard to public right. If they take advantage of the power to oppress the labor and overtax the land of the State; if they crush the industry of one man or place to build up the prosperity of another; if they plunder the rich by extortion, or deepen the distress of the poor by discriminating against them, they justify themselves by showing that all this was in the way of business; that their interest required them to do it; that if they had done otherwise their fortunes would not have been so great as they are; that it was the prudent, proper, and successful method of managing their own affairs. This is their universal answer to all complaints. Their protests against legislative intervention to protect the public always take this shape, with more or less distinctness of outline. In whatever language they clothe their argument it is the same in substance as that with which Demetrius, the silversmith, defended the sanctity of the temple for which he made shrines: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth."

* * * * * * *

I aver that a man or corporation appointed to do a public duty must perform it with an eye single to the public interest. If he perverts his authority to purposes of private gain, he is guilty of corruption, and all who aid and abet him are his accomplices in crime. He defiles himself if he mingles his own business with that intrusted to him by the Government, and uses one to promote the other. If a judge excuse himself for a false decision by saying that he sold his judgment for the highest price he could get, you cover his character with infamy. A ministerial officer, like a sheriff, for instance, who extorts from a defendant, or even from a convict in his custody, what the law does not allow him to collect, and puts the surplus in his pocket, is a knave upon whom you have no mercy. You send county commissioners to the penitentiary for consulting their own financial advantage to the injury of the general weal. When the officers of a city corporation make a business of running it to enrich themselves at the expense of the public, you can see at a glance that they are the basest of criminals. Why, then, can you not see that the officers of a railway corporation are equally guilty when they pervert the authority with which they are clothed to purposes purely selfish? A railroad corporation is a part of the civil government as much as a city corporation. The officers of the former, as much as the latter, are agents and trustees of the public, and the public has an interest precisely similar in the fidelity of both. Why, then, should partiality or extortion be condemned as criminal in one if it be tolerated as fair business when practiced by the other.

I am propounding no new and untried theory. The legislatures of nearly every State in this Union have, in fact, long assumed jurisdiction and exercised a control of railroads operating entirely within their boundaries and have, in fact, named a maximum rate for the carriage of passengers and freight.

There is one and only one reason why the various State legislatures have never exercised any control over interstate carriers. By the terms of the Constitution all power over interstate and foreign commerce was expressly delegated to Congress. Now it has been repeatedly decided that Congress has complete and exclusive control of interstate carriers. The various States did not lose or abandon any part of their power or jurisdiction. They simply delegated it. They did not and could not invest the Federal Congress with any greater or less authority than that which they originally exercised.

Then Congress is to the common carriers doing an interstate business exactly what the legislatures of the various States are to railroads operating entirely within the several States.

Why, the railroads of this country in their effort to escape every character of State supervision have defined, enlarged, and elucidated this position with a learning and skill I can never hope to emulate. They are the people who have preached to every legislature, into the ears of every State court, into the ears of every complainant, that they were the especial wards of the Federal Government and answerable only to the Federal Congress. [Applause.] For fifty years they have proclaimed the doctrine that they could always take refuge behind the ægis of the Constitution. I say to the common carriers of this country, who are kicking and squirming at the prospect of obedience to the provisions of this bill, you have appealed to Cæsar, and to Cæsar you must go. [Applause.]

Now, strange to say, the Federal Legislature has refused to exercise this authority, and the States can not, and during several decades the railroads have been practically immune from any restraint, State or national, and they are the only common carriers in the whole world which are now or ever have been free from any control or supervision, State or national, absolutely free to charge what they please, where they please, whom they please, and when they please.

Now, have the common carriers of this country abused this power? It has been anomalous; it has been unique; it has been tremendous. They have been left to work out their own salvation without any restraint, for it will be remembered that the wrongs they committed are "mala prohibita," and not "mala in se," and without the aid of statutory enactment the common law as interpreted by the Federal courts was helpless to restrain them. Let us see. With their 200,000 miles of railroad, with their sixteen billions of dollars of capital, they come before the bar of this House. Do they come with a record that they themselves claim is clean and honest? Do they come with a story of fair dealing between man and man or between carrier and carrier? Why, gentlemen, your very defense of the railroads, the men who themselves most loudly protest against the exercise of the authority conferred by this bill are the men who admit that they have been continually guilty of secret rebates, discriminations, and of private-car abuses, and more than one of them have said that such offenses should be punished by imprisonment and a felon's stripes. And the roads admit they have done these things; admit they are guilty of the offenses which their own defenders claim should be a felony. Oh, the railroads say, "You should give us the right to charge such rates as we please and you should not interfere or fix a maximum freight rate. We gave secret rebates, it is true, but the reason why the private-car abuse has grown throughout the country is that we were forced to do it; we were afraid of the packing companies." God help the corporation or the man whose integrity is not proof against his cupidity and his fear! [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, let us take for instance the story of these private-car evils.

About thirty years ago a shrewd Connecticut Yankee conceived this idea: Meats and berries and perishable fruits can be preserved indefinitely in almost all climates, under almost all atmospheric conditions, if you will give them an even temperature. All you have to do is to get a good refrigerator and you can keep for any length of time almost anywhere in this country your meats and your berries and your fruits. The idea was sublime in its severe simplicity, as all great conceptions are, and he determined to put a refrigerator on wheels. That was all. He went to these wise railroads whom you say know so much more than all the judges and all the courts and commissions and congresses since the day of Adam, and he proposed that they should build such cars. These wise men laughed him to scorn. Then Mr. Swift said to them—for he was this Yankee and at that time poor as a church mouse: "I will raise the few hundred dollars and build a car myself, if you will haul it." They said they would haul it.

From that humble beginning, from the genius of a Chicago butcher shipping a few thousand pounds of dressed meat in a car of which he was in part the inventor and entirely the promoter, within a few years this car system grew, this simple method of transporting fruit and vegetables in a moving refrigerator, until at the present day one gigantic trust owns 80,000 cars. The effect of this new means of transporting perishable products was electrical upon all fruit and vegetable producing sections of the country. Georgia melons were hawked in the streets of New York, and North Carolina furnished strawberries to the markets of Montreal.

The profits from this novel invention far outstripped the phenomenal growth of the business, till at last these 80,000 cars, costing only about $700 apiece on an average, were actually clearing $324 per annum each in mileage alone to the men who operate them.

In order to keep their contents at a given temperature, these fruit cars are provided with "bunkers," which are filled with ice by the carriers at stations established at fixed points along their lines, at which quantities of ice are stored for that purpose. The cost of renewing the ice in these cars is found to be about $2 a ton. The private car companies found in this so-called "icing charge," first, an opportunity for wholesale graft, and then they employed it as the means of absorbing the entire profit from this great industry. Mr. J. W. Midgley in his testimony before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee (hearings, p. 258), in order to illustrate by a special instance—this concealed method of wholesale larceny—

He referred to the fact that Armour, Swift, and other big packers had of late gone into the fruit and produce business, and he gave abundant instances from his personal experience to show that the packers rapidly were securing absolute control of the commission business of the country; that they were able by illegal methods to stifle competition, and that private car lines had an improper and unholy alliance with railroad companies.

Out of his personal experience the witness showed that in 1900 the price for icing a car of peaches from Michigan to Boston was $20. Then, the Armour Company secured an exclusive contract for doing all the icing on the Pere Marquette Railroad. The Armours immediately put the price up to $33 and finally to $70. According to the witness, Armour & Co. proceeded to buy up practically all the peaches in Michigan at their own figures, because they found it convenient to refuse cars to other shippers or to be unable to ice anything along the line of the Pere Marquette Railroad until after the fruit had rotted, thus forcing all competitors out of the field entirely.

I desire to call the attention of this committee to an instance cited by Mr. E. M. Furgeson, one of the greatest commission merchants in the United States. On February 4, 1905 (hearings, page 21), he gave to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a still more striking proof of the manner in which these commercial brigands divide their pluder secretly, wrung from a long suffering and victimized public. Says Mr. Furgeson:

In the following year, 1903, the Grand Rapids and Indiana and Grand Trunk were won over and taken into the secret compact. Then and there ended the commercial freedom of the Grand Rapids fruit industry, and all shippers but one at that point are now yielding up tribute to the system. One shipper there, who happened to own 30 refrigerator cars that he had operated for years on the mileage basis alone, was at first denied the privilege of using his own cars in making shipments, but in order that this shipper might not become troublesome, as his protests indicated he might, this shipper was privileged to use his own cars in making shipments to his customers on one condition only, to wit, that he become a party to the secret compact and agree to charge his customers the Armour rate, which the railway companies kindly offered to bill as advance charges against all shipments so made, collect from the consignee at the destination, and rebate this shipper the difference between the Armour charges collected and the actual cost of ice, based upon the total amount used at the rate of $2 per ton in the bunkers. And it will be noted in this case that the railway company undertook to do the icing itself, or rather arranged for its being done by the connecting lines over which the shipments might travel.

It will be remembered that these same refrigerator cars, costing as I have said about $700 apiece, each clear on an average $324 per annum in mileage alone to their owners. The icing charges are more remunerative in the fruit cars than the mileage. The railroads are forced to make all necessary repairs, so you have each of these cars practically paying for itself in a year.

When we consider the effect of this private-car abuse upon the vast cattle interests of this country, and the cold conscienceless plunder of eighty million of people who have been forced to pay tribute to these bandits upon every pound of meat consumed, the wonder is not that there is to-day a demand for relief from ocean to ocean, but that a long suffering and patient people have endured this outrage so long.

Six gigantic packing houses—Armour & Co., Swift & Co., Morris & Co., the National Packing Company, Schwarzschild & Sulzberger, and the Cudahy Packing Company—to-day fix the price of every steer, every hog, every sheep slaughtered in the United States, and then they hold an iron monopoly upon every pound of beef and mutton and pork consumed by the American people.

From a total of less than 7,000,000 cattle slaughtered in 1903, 5,521,697 passed through the hands of this all-controlling combine, commonly known as the "Big Six," and the following statement, prepared by an able and conservative expert, tells the sad story of multiplied millions, wrung from the hungry mouth of helpless toil.

Mr. Cuthbert Powell, of Kansas City, * * * makes the following estimate, based on one year's records in great western packing houses:

Native steers on the hoof average 1,205 pounds, and dressing 58 per cent in killing make, each, 700 pounds of clear meat. They sell in the Kansas City markets for 4¼ cents a pound, at which the live weight cost is $57.23.

Beef, 700 pounds, at 7¼ cents	$52.50
Hides (average value)	7.32
Fats (average value)	5.56
Offal (average value)	2.26
		$67.64
Deduct live-weight cost	57.23
Cost of killing	.50
General expenses of plant	2.50
		60.23
Profit		7.41

Mr. Powell says:

Applying the average profit of $7.41 on cattle, 20 cents on hogs, 50 cents on sheep, and 50 cents on calves, to the total number of head killed in a year by the "combine" packing houses, gives a total profit of $47,727,412. Figuring upon the total capitalization, undoubtedly heavily watered, of $110,500,000, we have 43 per cent profit on the stock. (The Greatest Trust in the World, by Chas. Edward Russell, pp. 161–162.)

A few years ago and the great Northwest, with its vast plains and mountain ranges, extending from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean, was one illimitable cattle ranch. The prosperity and happiness of multiplied millions of sturdy farmers and ranchmen was absolutely dependent upon this great industry. To-day this broad empire has been literally enveloped in the tentacular coils of a remorseless octopus and strangled to death. In three years, ending January 1, 1905, the value of beef cattle in the United States declined $163,000,000. The ranchman of the West, at the mercy of the beef trust, like the tobacco planter of Kentucky and Tennessee under the domination of the American Tobacco Company, found but one purchaser for his product; all competition was destroyed and cattle were sold year after year at less than the cost of production. As is always the case, the farmer, rendered destitute, like a blind Samson in the temple, brought the whole superstructure down upon his head; every other business felt in its very vitals the effect of the ruin which had been visited upon the tiller of the soil.

In Iowa alone, in the years 1903–4 there were 32 bank failures involving the loss of millions to depositors. The banks had loaned to the cattle raisers and they had been devoured by the beef trust. Conditions in Iowa are but illustrative of the wholesale disaster which was thus visited upon that whole country.

Mr. Charles Edward Russell, who has given this subject the most exhaustive investigation, thus describes the scope of this monster monopoly, which has sprung up almost in a night and now threatens the peace and prosperity of a nation:

Of some of the most important industries of this country it has an absolute, iron-clad, infrangible monopoly; of others it has a control that for practical purposes of profit not less complete. It fixes at its own will the price of every pound of flesh, salted, smoked, or preserved meat prepared and sold in the United States. It fixes the price of every ham, every pound of bacon, every pound of lard, every can of prepared soup. It has an absolute monopoly of our enormous meat exports, dressed and preserved. It has an absolute monopoly of the American trade in fertilizers, hides, bristles, horn and bone products. It owns or controls or dominates every slaughterhouse except a few that have inconsiderable local or special trade. It owns steam and electric railroads, it owns the entire trolley car systems in several cities, and is acquiring the like property elsewhere. It owns factories, shops, stock yards, mills, land and land companies, plants, warehouses, politicians, legislators, and Congressmen.

It defies Wall Street and all that therein is. It terrorizes great railroad corporations long used to terrorizing others. It takes toll from big and little, it gouges millions from railroad companies, and cent pieces from obscure shippers. To-day it is compelling a lordly railroad to dismiss its general manager, to-morrow it is black listing and ruining some little commission merchant. It is remorseless, tireless, greedy, insatiable, and it plans achievements so much greater than any so far recorded in the history of commerce that the imagination flags in trying to follow its future possibilities. (The Greatest Trust in the World, p. 2.)

It is not to be expected that any such an opportunity for exploitation and plunder was to be overlooked by that international outlaw, the Standard Oil Company. Like the Beef Trust and the Fruit Transportation companies, it made all its shipments of oil in its own private cars.

Now these great concerns formed a daring design which has no peer or parallel either in the annals of business or larceny. They determined not only to fleece the public, but to hold up the railroad companies themselves. With their 80,000 private cars, like the tank lines of the Standard Oil Company, they determined to use this vast quantity of freight as a huge club to beat the transportation companies into submission to their inordinate demands, notwithstanding the fact that the carriers controlled and operated over 200,000 miles of railway, aggregating in value over $16,000,000,000.

"The combine" had the routeing of these cars absolutely at their own disposal. They could say over just what road they would ship the whole or any part of them. They first demanded that there should be no charge for hauling their empty cars; then the system of secret rebates—the deadly hidden power to destroy all competition—then more mileage, till at last the roads were forced to pay for the privilege of hauling these private cars loaded or empty, three-quarters of a cent a mile on each car from all points east of Chicago; one cent a mile west of Chicago as far as El Paso, Albuquerque, and Ogden, and three-quarters of a cent the rest of the westward haul.

The roads protested. Then came the threat, "All our business goes to a rival line;" "Meet these terms or you haul not a car or a pound of this immense traffic." And in every case the roads surrendered. Then they demanded that the roads should keep the cars in repair, and forced the concession. At last came that crowning iniquity, the "icing charge," by which the road furnished ice at $2 a ton, and the combine made such charges for that same ice as their cupidity dictated, demanding the last dime which could be wrung from the plundered shipper. Then the final crowning infamy, that these charges should be concealed as part of the freight charge, and where the shipper refused to be plundered to be collected in advance or further shipments would be refused, thus blackmailing their hapless victims into compliance.

Thus they played upon the cupidity of the most eager and greedy organizations in all the world. They said, "Watch the hangman hang," and they arrayed railroad against railroad, robber against robber. Thus were the betrayers of the public in turn themselves betrayed. They said to one railroad, "You must give us this advantage or you get none of the traffic." In their eagerness to secure the carriage of these 80,000 cars the railroads themselves basely surrendered to the owners of these private car companies, basely agreed to conceal the robbery they were perpetrating upon the American people, basely agreed that their waybills should become the foul cloak of the most gigantic system of robbery ever known since bandits ceased to go about with mace and mail. [Applause.]

And now they come to us, whining that "we had to do the stealing or the other fellow would have gotten our trade." That is the defense. [Applause.]

Why, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] show an anger, an acrimoniousness, a viciousness in their assault upon this bill that amazes me from men usually so learned and so serene. I admire all three of those gentlemen; but I am amazed at the sinister, sacrilegious, and almost profane simile by which they seek to damn the unanimous voice of the people and an almost united effort of this House to save the industries of this country. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] has compared the endeavor of the public servants of the American people to stop this robbery with that foul plot which culminated in the crucifixion of my God. He has compared an agreement made in the open day and approved by the President of the United States with a secret conspiracy concocted between a cowardly Roman pretor and a murderous Jewish priest. [Applause.]

I quote his exact words:

> I heard expressed to-day by a gentleman who served on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee a profound regret that the gentlemen could not agree among themselves. They are all agreed upon one issue. I do not want to repeat myself, but I can recollect a similar instance when there was an agreement between men, about the time that one of the greatest wrongs was perpetrated that ever was perpetrated in human history, and it is recorded in these words: "And Pilate and Herod were made friends from that day."

I want to say to you gentlemen on that side of the House that the figure may have some propriety there, but I thank God there is no conscience-stricken Pilate here washing his hands of this legislation on the Democratic side. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you want to carry the simile further, I will do it. Pass this law and execute it rigorously against the railroads and the private-car companies alike and we will have two more thieves on the cross. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, they admit that the legislature has the right to control common carriers. They do not attempt to show that we are straining any constitutional power, not one of them. They do not say it is unconstitutional. They dare not as lawyers say it is unconstitutional, but they say it is unwise. Why? The people have been robbed; millions have been filched; the trust alone receives $72,000 a day from its private-car lines. Over $50,000,000 a year is being taken alone in icing charges and rebates. You all admit that trusts and monopolies are the curse and the menace of the age, and I here and now declare there is not a single insatiate and law-defying combination of capital in all the land that does not owe its being, growth, and power to one or both of those twin iniquities, alike in operation and in principle—a secret rebate and a protective tariff. Why, you take Iowa, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana; they talk so much about them, and in those four great States the population in the country has actually decreased during the last ten years. Where is your boasted cattle interest of the West? Dead. The West is full of bank failures in the face of your boasted prosperity. Why? In every part of it is the sad story of defalcation and bankruptcy. The price of cattle has continually gone down and the price of beef at the same time has gone up. The consumer has suffered and the producer has suffered.

Whenever you deprive the American laborer of his beef, whenever you say he shall not eat meat, you have reduced him to the very condition which you claim obtains in Europe, for the European laborer is unable to eat beef. It is that meat that gives vigor to the Army; it is that meat that gives power to the mechanic. It is because we are building up a nation of meat eaters we are able to dominate the world, and yet you admit the price of cattle has gone down in three years from 5½ cents to 4½ cents, while dressed beef has increased in the same proportion at the same time. Nothing but a trust can produce such a result. It is abnormal; it is absolutely impossible to account for it under any law of supply and demand. It is the throttling of supply and the domination of demand that does it. [Applause.]

You learned lawyers, I want to call your attention to one thing. No man from the West has raised his voice against this bill; no man from the South has raised his voice against this bill. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] protests against it; the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] protests against it; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] protests against it. We have much to learn from those three wise men of the East. [Applause.] Do they tell us it is unconstitutional? No. Do they tell us that we are violating any basic principle of law? No. The gentleman from Maine says, "Ah, my God, you can not afford to do it because Bryan is not dead and the country is full of Populists." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, the gentleman from Massachusetts, that learned gentleman, compares us to hyenas and bears and hounds:

> Mr. MCCALL. There may be evidence of a sense of justice in all this, but, if so, it is the sense of justice not of man, but of the hyena and the bear. The philosophy of it is that you may run for your life, but you are eaten if you stand, and you will be eaten if you are caught. Compared with the scheme of this bill there is a certain nobility in the policy of government ownership, wrong as I believe that policy to be. You carve our magnificent railroad system, not as a feast fit for the gods, but hew it as a carcass fit for hounds.

Now they have called us "kuklux" in the South. They have called us "wild and woolly" in the West, but I will swear we are neither hyenas nor hounds. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] discusses at length this wild hysteria, this cry of the mob, and yet they all admit that a great majority of the American people favor this legislation. Oh, my wise friends from the East, there is one thing you can not see, and that is the oppression of your kind. There is one thing you never heard from Hamilton until now, and that is the cry of the poor. You have never been able and you never will be able to distinguish between the American people rising in their majesty and their might and the insane clamor of a crazy mob. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I confess that I must unlearn all I ever knew before I can sit at the feet of these three wise men who follow a golden light from Wall street. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A star that will set as well as rise in the East. I will have to unlearn the teachings of Jefferson when he declared that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. I will have to unlearn the theory that we are the servants, not the masters, of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will have to forget that principle almost as old as civilization that I have followed, and in my foolish fatuity will follow until I die, that "the voice of the people is the voice of God." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Treat them as an insane mob if you will. Treat them with scorn, contumely and contempt if you will, but the American people, serene, undaunted; unmindful of your carpings and your contempt are still the masters of this Republic, are bigger than courts and congresses and senates, are unpurchasable by wealth, and are not to be daunted or frightened by the wild clamor of its chosen sponsors. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, you say, it is Democratic. Well, I agree with you. It is the most Democratic thing, gentlemen, on the other side of the Chamber, that you ever did since you were baptized. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yes; it is Democratic. It is Democratic, not because the leader of this House, JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, preached it at St. Louis, as he only can. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is Democratic not because for nearly ten years it has found a place in our platforms. The platforms demanded railroad legislation because it was Democratic. We did not make it Democratic. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS proclaimed it because it was Democratic. It was Democratic before you were born, so old as you are. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is the dogma of Jefferson applied to present conditions. It is equal rights to all and special privileges to none [applause on the Democratic side], uttered in a way that the common carriers shall understand.

Oh, they say that this is Bryan's baby. I do not mean to reflect upon its paternity, but it is what you would call, gentlemen, a child of the people. It belongs to the Democratic party, and it is no baby. If it had not been for the tender nurturing care of that long-haired anarchist, William Jennings Bryan, it would have been run over by a train long ago. I want to say for Mr. Bryan that he is not only the idol of Democracy and the defender of the poor, but the utterance of his name to any unpenitentiaried thief on Wall street, without regard to his profession or his party, makes him shudder. He is the winged Nemesis of graft and plunder everywhere. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You may well fear him. These private-car companies in 1896 gave $400,000 in three checks to keep him in private life, and they may well dread to see the prospect of a Daniel come to judgment.

Oh, it is so Democratic. I look over there on that side of the House. You talk about insurrections? Why, how the conqueror of the conquerors is conquered over there. The fellow who gave the dose is now trying to take it, and what a mouth he makes. Why, if you look at the wheel horse of the Republican party, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the weight is all on the breeching and not on the tugs. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Half of your leaders are insurgents, and there is many a stand-pat, stalwart Achilles, who was wont to lead the unterrified hosts of Republicanism from Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, now sulking in his tent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is only one reason on earth why you swallow this bill, and that is because your President wants it. I have never gone into hysterics over President Roosevelt, and I never will, but I believe he is fairly honest and a fine judge of human nature, and that is the reason he is favoring this Democratic measure, and you are afraid when he shows his teeth and you squirm and cower when he cracks his whip. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I am so deeply interested in the gentleman's speech that, with the consent of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], I ask that the time he promised to give to me be yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] may proceed under that understanding.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to differ with my learned friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] anywhere, for to know him is to love him. Genial and affable, I was surprised to hear him cry that anarchists and the Populists and the nihilists would get us if we didn't watch out.

He warns us—

So the forces have swept on until they are in the throes of state socialism, and they are going to make a glorious success of it just as long as there remains in pockets of thrift and industry one dollar to be wrung out in the form of taxation. Then there comes, as the sequence to the socialistic state, the state of anarchy, and then the reign of terror, and then the swing of the pendulum to the other side, and the strong man on horseback. In all human history that has been the experience, and society has been forced to rebuild its shattered superstructure upon those foundations which guarantee the rights of persons and of property.

I was surprised to hear a man raised in this land of liberty and enjoying the fruits of freedom preach here that you could have too much of it.

Ah, my genial friend from Pennsylvania, if you will excuse the almost familiar way in which I address you, I have not so read my country's history. In a thousand years no scion of the Saxon race has ever betrayed the boon of too much liberty. The commune has triumphed, yes. But come and review with me the story of its ravages.

Do you believe it was because the English people were too free that they took a perfidious and cowardly Stuart out yonder at Whitehall and led him to the fatal block? Do you believe that it was too much freedom that hurled the red-capped Jacobin, wild and fierce, into the streets of Paris? Nay, nay! Anarchy and nihilism are protests; they are not principles. They are but another side of the horrible picture. The cause of anarchy, the cause of nihilism, the cause of a revolution—they all come from the weight of oppression, not the abuse of freedom.

"The man on horseback" was not the creature of the commune—he was the necessary, the inevitable evolution of an age of despotism.

Centuries before, vainly endeavoring to obscure the dawn of a new era, a Richelieu and a Mazarin filched the scepter from the palsied hand of a weak and decaying medieval chivalry, and then they endowed a tyrant's throne with all this purloined power. All the weight of this cunningly woven fabric of oppression was placed upon the backs of a helpless people, a people who were outraged and plundered, until the burden became too heavy for human shoulders and human hearts, and crushed them in the mire.

At last "the mud took fire, and a dirty rag became a banner;" then riot and brutality, rapine and massacre; then the mob in its blind fury made victims of its masters and wiped out its wrongs in blood. The commune has triumphed; it will triumph again; but it has triumphed only at the scaffold of a king. No constitutional government need ever dread its rage.

The people of this land are free, and they cherish their freedom.

Why, our Government is predicated upon the idea of all republics, that the greater the refinement, the greater the culture, the greater the patriotism of the people the greater measure of liberty you may give them; and when you preach, and when the gentleman from Maine preaches, and the gentleman from Massachusetts preaches, that to give the people the right to rule is surrendering to the mob, you are proclaiming an old and detested fallacy as foul and as false as the history of kings and as cruel as tyranny. The American people are still capable of governing themselves. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, there are two sections in this bill that are not frequently mentioned which are potent. One provides for the uniformity of railroad accounts and the other for their inspection. It will be interesting to watch the tribulations of those two provisions before this legislation is finished. I have been a patient listener to all the arguments made here for the last six days—none more so than I. On its economic side four assertions have developed in the debate and four answers, as follows:

First assertion: Average rates showed for years a decrease and are still below those of other countries. The answer: Reasonable average rates do not preclude the existence of excessive charges in particular instances.

Second assertion: Rates are governed by natural laws, competition being the regulator of prices. Answer: Railroad competition exists only in particular places, and as consolidations continue less and less in those places. Railroad services are not private, and for that reason economic principles can not be wholly relied upon. Natural laws do affect the average rate, with but little effect upon a particular charge.

Third assertion: The power given to make any rate is the power to make all rates, because of the interdependence of rates. Answer: Traffic managers constantly change their rates without creating disorder.

Fourth assertion: It is impracticable for public authority to make rates, because there is no standard of reasonableness. Answer: It is impossible to show that a rate is unreasonable per se; but it is legitimate to make comparisons, and rates are so made.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] termed this a rash and reckless method of regulation. I would suggest to him that over forty years ago Charles Sumner introduced the first bill in the American Congress to regulate interstate commerce. I would suggest also to him that thirty-two years ago the House of Representatives passed a bill to regulate commerce, which, by the way, died in the Senate, and that of the eighteen causes that were cited before the Senate committee twenty years ago, as causes of complaint, sixteen are clamorous to-day. So the measure is not rash, nor is it reckless.

There are railroad managers and railroad managers. There are men who realize the injustices in the situation, who are proud of the accomplishments of transportation, who desire further to perfect it. Theirs has been a hard struggle. They have had conditions forced upon them by stock-gambling magnates which have been obnoxious. They have suffered from situations brought on by the Wall street gamble as much as the public.

I believe that the independent railroad man is going to have more to do with the solution of the problem than anybody else.

His concern to-day is over the greed of the Wall street magnates, who are intent upon absorbing all lines. Ours ought to be, if for no other reason than this: That nowhere is belief in American ideals weaker than in the minds of the stock-gambling magnates of Wall street who are seeking to control the railways of the United States.

Illustrating this, I desire to read a few lines—lines which no independent railroad president or manager would indorse, but which are fairly typical of the Wall street gambler. They first appeared in the North American Review and were snatched up, presumably by the Wall street publicity bureau, in December and sent broadcast:

> Create the proposed commission, with power to establish rates, and the future of the railroad would be largely in their control. A Presidential election is approaching, and the railroads are asked to contribute to the party funds. They refuse to comply or to give as much as the party managers desire. Would a railroad dare decline, after receiving an intimation that it would be well to contribute more liberally? A railroad president, in his anger, refuses, says he belongs to the other party, or does not like the candidate or his methods. Forthwith some shipper makes his complaint, that he is paying an unreasonable rate. The president soon discovers that he is in a net, with only one way to get out; the desired contribution is given, the party beggar calls off the shipper, and the difficulty is over. Will the railroads be kept out of national politics when a commission, composed of a few men, has its firm grip on them, with power to squeeze out of them contributions, or to influence the suffrages of their numerous employees? Create this commission and the future of every Presidential election can be foretold.

This charge of so mean, so miserable a motive, and its threat are characteristic of the attitude of Wall street, and I, for one, hope that when the contest with Wall street comes, as it will, that the House of Representatives will go to battle as one fighting uncompromisingly for a principle, and not as a champion who, in the frenzy of doing or dying, first tucks away in his pistol pocket as a measure of precaution a flag of truce. For the conservatism which has its day of triumph will have its day of defeat—for the day of defeat will be forced upon it. I hope to live to see the day. I shall rejoice when defeat comes to the conservative who, had he lived in the days of rush lights, would have stood out firmly against the introduction of candles, or if it had been a legislative matter, at least would have approached the tallow dip cautiously, "step by step."

Traffic results do not always harmonize with traffic theories. I have gone into the matter of local rates. Increasing volume of through traffic, according to traffic theory, goes to a reduction of local rates. The great mogul locomotive, the larger car, the reduced grade, the straighter track, and the heavier rail have all gone to the reduction in cost of transportation. The rate per ton per mile has fallen in the United States from 9.41 mills in 1890 to 7.8 mills in 1904. But I can not find that the local rates have shared in all this. In a large majority of the cases I have examined they have remained unchanged or increased. There are some reductions. I append a few tariffs with a summary.

NOTE.—The rates shown for 1900 were in force on June 30, 1902.

These rates are taken from regular tariff schedules on file. They may not be complete upon their face in some instances. Special tariffs may have torn some of them to pieces, change of classification may have modified them: but they are regularly filed tariffs and repose among the 2,600,000 tariff schedules on file here in Washington, in vindication of the not wholly successful policy of publicity, and they are interesting as tending to show the increasing toll local traffic is paying and will continue to pay until some practical working modification of the fourth section of the original act becomes law and, without undue injury to through traffic and market necessities, protects it.

This, the Hepburn bill, in its provision for uniformity of railroad accounts, for their inspection, in its proposal to empower the Commission to establish through routes and fix the rate thereon, and to amend an unreasonable rate, will, I hope, do great good; it could be made to do more by putting into law that which would prevent the traffic man from levying an unjust rate in the first instance, and it should have a provision giving supervision over classifications and greater power over unjust discriminations and more direct reference to private cars.

These local rates I have given are but incidental manifestations, showing, in the major portion of the local rates selected, of the evil principle and the more evil practice beneath. Seven or eight men are now said to control a major portion of our railways. One-tenth our wealth is in our carrying system. Once a day a $5,000,000 toll is exacted. These magnates are magnates, captains of industry indeed. They have been extolled on this floor. I gave in the beginning the Wall street magnates' estimate of the probity of a Federal commission. At the risk of offending the sense of practicality of this House, I would shadow forth a railroad magnate in keeping with the benefits of transportation; would limn him as the benignant genius of magic that brings everything near, makes everybody immediate, that enlarges the producer's market, touches with infinite variety the consumer's supply, lifts the cheapening pressure of a glut here, fills the mouth of famine there, and has turned the luxuries of yesterday's few into the necessities of to-day's many. See the magnate in keeping with that, a gentle figure, a figure of power, of power always with justice.

Consider him as he exercises a fatherly regard for the system, his employees, and the territory he serves. Imagine him as conscious of his power, with the brake of moderation always down, requiring uniformity of treatment among his patrons, justice to locality, giving no concession to the powerful, no preference to the grasping, exacting no undue tribute from the weak, garnering everywhere honor, gathering everywhere acclaim, inspiring in subordinates affectionate imitation, and winning from the people the private regard which in the aggregate makes for the highest public esteem—one knowing the duties of a common carrier, instinct with allegiance to the public interests, quick with the high impulses of a righteous public servitor.

Among our Wall street magnates you will not find him. But let us justify ourselves to an emancipated future at least to the extent of daring to hope for his coming. Such a man would never seek in the law's delay, in its making, its interpretation, or its execution escape from the law. Disdaining to displace, as a common carrier, public interest with a private interest, inspired and actuated by the foresight which reveals always the personal interest best conserved in the end by a broad regard for the general welfare, this magnate would come at last to a realization of the plenary degree of his power—the realization which no subsidy through favor, no submission through fear, no sycophancy through fear or favor can ever bring to him.

This man would suffer no manipulation of railway accounts, would refuse to share in industries making him a preferred shipper on his own line, would collect no toll except as a common carrier, but, requiring justice, exercising impartiality, this man would enter into the enthusiasms of the smallest town upon his line as well as the ambitions of the largest cities, and would come to share in popular esteem, with all the benefits of modern transportation, and to be blamed for none of its delinquencies; and he would win for his children's sake that which no Wall street magnate has to-day, that which would surely be honey to the surfeited palate of his power, that which he can not buy, force, or cajole—the privilege of being extolled as transportation is extolled in the lines of permanent literature.

All this he might have and might hold if he would accept the demand of the nation upon him to-day—that he exercise a lesser concern for his interests as a magnate and a greater concern for his interests as a citizen.

We were assured yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that the men who control from New York do not make rates—know nothing about them, in fact.

The traffic manager is supposed to make rates. But he does not. But, under directions, he orders how they shall be made. For a year or two now the traffic manager has hovered over the situation like a specter. We are asked to look upon him as a wizard sitting in the midst of a maze of commercial intricacies which nobody but himself can understand. He is a man of might. He stands accused here and elsewhere of having—

Dodged from national regulation behind the road's State charter and from State regulation behind his interstate rights.

Ignored the requests of the helpless and connived with the powerful in concessions.

Decreed that this city prosper and the progress of another be impeded.

Built up one merchant and torn down his neighbor.

Put forth the dogma that there is no science is rate making.

Approved the maintenance of the science of the three shells and the ball, the science of sleight of hand, pleasurable always as entertainment, but fraud in commerce; of eliminating distance in one locality's toll, using it as a basis in another's; pleading cost of service in one instance, value of service in other; publishing a tariff sheet as an evidence of stability and tearing it away with special tariffs, and of permitting indulgence in the manipulation of minimum car weights, midnight tariffs, rebates, underbilling, participating terminal lines, private car allowances, icing charges, and commissions.

Invaded the precincts of a national policy—with his import rate doing openly and indirectly what the smuggler does in secret and straightway—overcome the barrier of a protective tariff.

It has been denied here over and over again that there is any demand for this legislation.

But the country knows the demand, and knows how it has been met by the great transportation power, as one who stands exercising a great public trust without public responsibility, wielding great power without limit to his pleasure, ordering, with sublime certainty in his security, that the storm of a national instinct, distinguishing between right and wrong, asking only uniformity when it pays, and a place for expeditious redress when it is wronged, ordering that such a storm be dammed out and dammed back by a sophist's tract and a phamphleteer's convention.

In closing I will quote from Senator's Palmer's speech in the Senate twenty years ago:

Railroads are no longer joint stock companies alone; they are dynasties. They are already outlined and in a few years, if not supervised and controlled by legislation, they will become as firmly fixed in their grasp upon continued power, commercial, social, and political, as the Hapsburgs, the Hohenzollerns, or the Guelphs. These reigning houses were born of force. They were the triumph of the strong over the weak. These modern dynasties will have been born of law and of concession and will be the triumph of the creature over the creator.

Mr. Chairman, this is a conservative measure, born of a conservative time and of a conservative body, hard to prick through the thick callous of a profound prosperity; and while I know that if I had gray hairs and a solemn face I could say it with a greater grace, I sound this warning to those here so comfortably cushioned in the luxuries of the safe side—that the day will come when the needle will reach the quick. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the manner in which the gentleman from Kansas, who is a very thorough student, has discussed this question, and for that reason I want to ask him this question: Would not every word of the peroration of his remarks apply with equal, if not greater, force to the free-silver craze that went over the country ten years ago?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think not.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may need to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. CONNER].

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that certain Members who are opposed to the passage of the rate bill should in debate make the criticism that those who favor the measure are driven into supporting it by an intemperate public sentiment said to exist in its favor in the Middle West. It is quite unfortunate that some who favor it should charge the opposition with being under the influence of Wall street. I readily accord to every Member on this floor the right to decide for himself and to say whether he is for or against this or any other measure without having his motives called in question. My estimate of the character of the membership of the House is such that I do not for one moment entertain the belief that either charge has any foundation whatever to support it. Insinuations of this character but detract from the dignity or the House, and furnish no aid toward the solution of the great questions involved in the discussion.

Our friends on the Democratic side of the Chamber have not been content to permit the debate to proceed along business and economic lines, but have sought to inject politics into the discussion by repeatedly asserting that this is a Democratic measure and that the principles of the bill had their birth in Democratic councils. They even charge that the Republican party is driven to take up the legislation by an irresistible public demand. Everyone will concede that the Democratic party has met in conventions and adopted platforms which at the time may have been in favor with the people and which it conceived would add to the popularity of the party. It is characteristic of the party to adopt high-sounding platforms rather than to formulate policies which may with safety be enacted into legislation. Notwithstanding it may have placed itself on record in the manner claimed, it does not seem to have won the confidence of the people of the country, for they have preferred to trust the Republican party without platform declarations rather than the Democratic party with them. If something effective is to be done, the people naturally turn to the Republican party for its accomplishment, as they have, in order to secure legislation on this question. The record of the Republican party is secure in the fact that all the important laws on the Federal statute books were placed there by it.

If our Democratic friends desire to know the record of their party in the enactment of legislation against trusts and illegal combinations, it will only be necessary to go back into history to the time when both the President and the House of Representatives were Democratic. In his annual message to Congress in December, 1887, the President called the attention of Congress to the fact that trusts were then in existence, and that others were constantly forming and were becoming a menace to the welfare of the country. The House authorized one of its important committees to investigate the question of whether or not trusts were then in existence and others in process of formation. An investigation was instituted which continued over a period of several months, when the committee reported to the House that it had found trusts to be in existence and that others were being organized. After this report was made the committee continued to further investigate the question, but refrained from making its final report until two days prior to the expiration of the Democratic Administration and the inauguration of a Republican President, when it came into the House and reported that it was unable to deal with the question, and that on account of the difficulty of the members of the committee to agree upon a plan of action the whole matter was referred to the next Congress for its consideration.

The next Congress, as well as the President, was Republican, and within a short time after it convened a law was passed against trusts and illegal combinations, which is known as the "Sherman antitrust law." This law was passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President. Since its enactment trusts and illegal combinations of capital have been and are being successfully prosecuted. I say this, not alone with a view to eulogizing the Republican party, but to show our Democratic friends the distinction between adopting platforms and enacting wholesome legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this measure and shall vote for it, but shall not do so in order to get rid of it and to hurry it to another forum, in the hope that there it may undergo a destructive surgical operation. I trust that when it is returned to this body it will not be in such a distorted condition that its identity can not be recognized. I do not contend that the measure is perfect, for, as I view it, it is not, but the principle of the bill meets with my hearty approval, and, in addition, it contains features which are highly desirable.

The legislation which is sought to be secured is of the highest importance and worthy of most serious consideration; it may be regarded as progressive legislation. It goes one step further than has yet been taken by the General Government in the direction of remedial legislation intended to regulate common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. It is not new in its provision for the creation of a commission to investigate the reasonableness of rates of common carriers, for the law now in force provides for such a commission; but it is new in that it confers upon the Commission greater powers than it has heretofore possessed.

It has been frequently asserted during the debate and not seriously disputed that for several years after the Cullom law of 1887 was enacted it was generally understood by the people that the Commission was clothed with authority to substitute a rate where, upon complaint by the shipper, the one then in force was found to be unjust, unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, and the rate which the Commission should thus prescribe should become the legal rate to be charged by the carrier unless and until set aside by a proper tribunal.

In 1897 the Supreme Court of the United States in what is known as the Maximum Rate case, reported in 167 United States Supreme Court Reports, held that the Cullom law did not confer upon the Commission the power to substitute a rate in place of the one condemned, and that the order of the Commission in prescribing a rate for the future amounted to nothing more than a recommendation to the common carrier. It is needless to say that since that time the orders of the Commission have neither been respected nor obeyed.

This want of power on the part of the Commission to fix a rate in the place of one condemned is recognized as the weak spot in the interstate-commerce law. Personally I have believed, and now believe, that an amendment of a few words to the law of 1887 expressly restoring to the Commission what has been termed "this lost power" would go far toward correcting the evils complained of. One of the features of this measure, and in my judgment the main one, is intended to strengthen the law by giving to the Commission the power which the people of the country generally believe was conferred upon it until this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was made. It was because of the attempt to remedy this defect in the Cullom law and to confer upon the Commission this power that the intense opposition on the part of the railroad companies, which for several months the country has witnessed, was organized, and which has been "instant in season and out of season" endeavoring to defeat the legislation. Here is the battle ground between the people on the one side and the corporations on the other. The issue is clearly defined and is well understood. The purpose is not to deprive the carriers of the right to fix rates in the first instance, nor is it to give the Commission power to initiate rates.

The question is, Shall the Government be authorized by a law of Congress to regulate the great transportation companies in the United States to the extent that the Commission, where, upon complaint and investigation, a rate fixed by the carrier is found to be unjust, unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, shall have the right to prescribe what it determines to be a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate, and to put it in force in the future in the place of the one condemned? If the bill in question is enacted into law, then this power will be given to the Commission. If it fails to become a law, then the effort to secure rate legislation will have been waged in vain, and the evils which now exist will continue. If this bill becomes a law, it will be a triumph for the people and will vitalize the provision of the Constitution conferring upon Congress the right to regulate commerce among the States by placing in the hands of the Government a power to say that the rate to be charged by the common carrier for the transportation of persons and property shall be just and reasonable and to confer upon a commission of its own creation the power to condemn as unjust and unreasonable a rate fixed by the carrier and to substitute in lieu thereof a rate for the future which the Commission determines to be just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative.

What are the objections urged against this legislation? It is contended by some gentlemen that Congress has not the power to prescribe a rate to govern the carrier in the future. It is asserted by a larger number that if this power is conceded Congress has not the authority to create a commission and clothe it with power to prescribe a rate to govern the carrier in any sense.

Speaking for myself, I am fully convinced that as a matter of law Congress itself can prescribe a maximum rate of charge for the carrier, and I am just as fully convinced that it may commit to a commission of its own creation the power to prescribe a rate in the manner provided for in this measure.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Munn v. Illinois, held that "under the powers inherent in every sovereignty a government may regulate the conduct of its citizens toward each other and, when necessary for the public good, the manner in which each shall use his own property." This language states a proposition which has been good law as long as common carriers have had an existence, and is good law at this time. The owner of private property, used in a strictly private way and so as not to interfere with the rights of others, can use it free from legislative regulation or control, but when it becomes affected with a public interest and is devoted to a use in which the public has an interest the public acquires an interest in such use and the owner can be compelled to submit to regulation by the public to the extent of such interest.

This is not a new doctrine. In the exercise of this power it has been the custom in England for centuries and in this country from the earliest times to regulate ferries, hackmen, warehousemen, millers, and the like, and to fix a maximum charge to be made for services rendered or accommodations furnished. It is held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the legislature has the same control over business and property of corporations that it has over that of individuals.

A large number of States in the Union have enacted laws creating commissions for the purpose of fixing rates and freights to be charged by common carriers within the State, and in some States the commission is given the power to initiate rates. The right of States to enact such legislation has been most vigorously assailed in the courts, but in all the cases which have been submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States the power of the State to enact the legislation has been fully sustained, and to-day no respectable lawyer is willing to question this power on the part of the State. No reason can be urged for claiming that if a State can legally enact such legislation to regulate its domestic commerce that Congress can not do the same thing respecting commerce of an interstate character.

In the Maximum Rate case heretofore referred to the court, in considering the question as to the extent of the power conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Cullom law, and whether the act conferred upon it the power to prescribe a rate for the future in lieu of the one which it condemned, uses this language:

> There are three obvious but dissimilar courses open for consideration: Congress might itself prescribe a rate, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty, or it might leave with the companies the right of fixing rates subject to such regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable.

This language is susceptible of but one construction, and that is that Congress has the power to say that the rates to be charged by a common carrier shall be just and reasonable, and to create a commission and to clothe it with power, not only to investigate a rate complained of, but, if found to be unjust, unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, to prescribe a rate to take its place in the future, and that the rate thus prescribed shall become the legal rate unless and until set aside by a proper tribunal.

Mr. Chairman, the pending measure is limited rather than general in its scope; it is reasonable rather than radical; it does not purport to remedy all existing evils. A bill framed to correct all abuses in interstate commerce would stand but little show of becoming a law. There may be disappointment because the bill does not include express companies, Pullman companies, and some other public agencies which it is desirable to regulate, but it must be borne in mind that to secure any relief the bill must first pass both Houses of Congress, and the danger is that if it embraces too many features, however meritorious, it will encounter such opposition that its defeat will be encompassed. For this reason it is better to omit some of the features which invite opposition than to entirely defeat the legislation.

This measure seems to have been framed with the chief purpose of conferring upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power which the Supreme Court, in the Maximum Rate case, held was not given to it by the Cullom law; that is, the power to prescribe a rate for the future in a case where, upon investigation, the rate in force is condemned as unjust, unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory. This power is clearly given in the pending measure and is its crowning feature, and if nothing else were included, the law, when enacted, will be worthy of all the efforts which have been made to secure its adoption.

But there are other provisions in the bill which, if not so important as this one in solving the problem of rate control, will prove of great aid in restraining an evil which has obtained and still continues in spite of the Elkins law against rebates, and which results in discriminations in favor of the large shipper as against the small one. I refer to the mischief which comes from the use of the private car, private car lines, switches, terminal facilities, and charges for services rendered by the shipper as a means of securing and enabling the payment of rebates. It is a matter of common knowledge that frequently the shipper, by reason of owning a spur or track connecting his plant with the main line of railroad, or by owning the cars in which his products are carried to market, or because of services rendered by him, is enabled to make claims for exorbitant offsets in settlement of transportation charges, which the carrier willingly, sometimes unwillingly, allows, and the shipper thus favored is able to have his produce carried at a much lower rate than his competitor, who must take his choice of retiring from business or facing bankruptcy. This bill furnishes a remedy against the further practice of this abuse, and, in my opinion, a remedy which will effectually prevent a continuance of this evil for which there is no defense in law or morals.

The publicity feature of the bill is desirable and should not only aid in discouraging rebates, but in preventing other abuses which have obtained in the past.

Mr. Chairman, the proposed legislation is not sought in a spirit of hostility, but in a desire to recognize and secure the rights of both the transportation companies and the people. No one could justify a motive less exalted. The interests involved are too great, and the consequences of what may be done will be too far-reaching to excuse anything short of the exercise of the highest intelligence and the loftiest purposes in dealing with the matter. On the one hand are the common carriers, with billions upon billions invested in their properties, with over 200,000 miles of railroad, earning more than $2,000,000,000 annually, paying expenses amounting to nearly $1,500,000,000, employing more than a million and a quarter of men, and whose wages aggregate almost a billion of dollars each year. These vast interests are warning us against the dangers of interfering with existing conditions. On the other hand are more than 80,000,000 people, with an aggregate wealth of a hundred billion dollars, greater than that of any other nation, and practically equal to that of any other two nations, who of necessity must avail themselves of the use of the railroads in transporting passengers and freights and in moving the immense commerce of the country, who demand not as a favor, but as a right, that these great agencies of commerce shall not be permitted to continue the abuses which all admit have existed in the past, and that the Congress of the United States shall accept the responsibility which, under the Constitution, devolves upon it and enact such legislation as will cure existing evils and promote the interests of both the carrier and the shipper alike. With a full realization of the importance of the obligation which rests upon us, we can not fail to strive to deal fairly with all interests, and thereby carry out the suggestion of President Roosevelt that "the highways of commerce must be kept open to all on equal terms." This is our highest duty and should be our highest pleasure. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HUBBARD].

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, the most stringent indictment of existing conditions in railway rates and the most powerful arguments which I have so far heard in favor of this measure are those coming from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY]. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] tells us, under plea of economic law, that the cotton manufacturers of Maine exist only by virtue of discrimination in railroad rates in favor of those manufacturers; that they have arisen, not because of the superiority of their industry, not because of their water power, but that take away from them the upholding power of discriminatory rates and they will be throttled to death. Preach that to the gentlemen from the South with their growing manufactures of cotton. Again, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], in the name of natural economic law, tells us of the West that by virtue of these discriminatory rates our fields have arisen in value, while theirs have become depopulated and their agriculture has almost ceased. It is indeed noticeable and indeed pitiable that as you approach these New England cities you find the people concentrated in manufacturing cities; you find their farms abandoned; you find agriculture almost dead. They tell us, again, that in the fields of Pennsylvania the same phenomena have occurred; that by reason of discriminatory rates in favor of the West their fields have become abandoned, their values have decreased; and so in New York, that the values of lands have decreased and agriculture sunk to a low ebb. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a most pitiable condition, if true, and one which we should seek, if possible, to avoid. It is not a healthful and desirable condition to have the farm abandoned and the city crowded. It is not wise to foster conditions which destroy agriculture in the East and manufactures in the West. I desire, and I believe this House desires, to look at this matter from a higher standpoint than the manufacturer of Lewiston or the cornfield of Iowa. We desire to look at it from the standpoint of our country and our whole country, not from the standpoint of some limited corner or portion of the country. [Applause.]

This is the very proposition that is fatal to your contention, gentlemen of Maine, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania. You ask not the free play of economic law, but that unnatural discriminations shall build and destroy in spite of natural economic law. You appeal to natural economic law. That which you demand is the removal of that law. What is the natural economic law of transportation? It is that he who has an advantage shall keep it; that he who has an advantage shall reap the advantage; that he who has the advantage of a fertile soil shall reap that advantage; that he who has the advantage of water power or nearness to markets (or cheapness of raw material) shall reap that advantage. You would destroy the economic law and have a condition of affairs continue to exist which, instead of distributing industry naturally and uniformly the country over, would and has and does concentrate it. You would have enforced a law which, by the very force and nature of its being, concentrates capital; a law which exists for the sake of the individual rather than for the sake of the community, which lifts the wealth of the tens and destroys the wealth of the thousands.

What is the king's highway, the natural law of transportation? It is that every man shall be given an equal, a fair, and an open chance upon the king's highway. That is the law of transportation, and it is that law which has been persistently transgressed. I believe, sir, that a square deal is a fair deal, fair to all alike, fair to us of the West. We ask for no pap. We ask for no discriminatory railroad rates to help our industries. Our cornfields laugh at you, our wheat fields smile golden beneath the sun and ask not your help. We will take care of ourselves. Give us a square deal. You will continue to eat our bread and meat. You may favor more farming, we more manufactures. It is asked, What is a square deal? It means a deal from the top and not from the bottom of the pack. It means a deal in which every man gets his own hand, in which every man who sits in the game is not expected to have cards up his sleeve, in which the whole table is dealt to fairly, and there are no marked cards in the deck. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, while this bill does not go as far as I would like to have it, and I fear that it will not accomplish all the desired results and all that is anticipated by the committee, and while I fully appreciate, as does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the impossibility of amending it, coming as this one does backed up by a unanimous report of the committee, yet I have no criticism to make. I fully appreciated the difficulty, the impossibility of drawing a bill that would meet the approval of all; and the committee and the country are to be congratulated on the successful and happy termination of this all-important question by this committee bringing in such an excellent measure.

In my estimation it is the strongest and best measure, and one that will give the most effective results, if enacted into law, of any bill brought into this House.

Section 1 provides:

The term "railroad," as used in this act, shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease, and shall also include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of the persons or property designated herein, and also all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary in the transportation or delivery of any of said property; and the term "transportation" shall include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported; and it shall be the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of this act to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and to establish through routes and just and reasonable rates applicable thereto.

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

Section 15 provides:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates or charges whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged, and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation, to the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, etc.

Section 16 provides:

It shall be the duty of every common carrier, its agents and employees, to observe and comply with such orders so long as the same shall remain in effect.

Any carrier, any officer, representative, or agent of a carrier, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, or agent of either of them, who knowingly fails or neglects to obey any order made under the provisions of section 15 of this act shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $5,000 for each offense. Every distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense.

The forfeiture provided for in this act shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States, brought in the district where the carrier has its principal operating office or in any district through which the road of the carrier runs.

The bill not only gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the power, after full investigation and hearing, to determine what just and reasonable rates are; but it gives that Commission that most important power, the power which the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and others have so vigorously objected to, that which I have contended for, and which was provided for in a bill which I introduced a year ago, the very thing which the conventions, the jobbers, the petitioners have been asking, and that which other bills reported last year did not provide for—that is, it gives the Commission exclusive power to enforce its findings; and whenever a change in a rate has been ordered by the Commission it must go into effect within thirty days; and if this order is not obeyed by the carriers they are subject to a fine of $5,000, every distinct violation to be a separate offense, and in case of a continued violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense; the said order not being subject to judicial review and temporary restraining orders, as provided in other bills reported to this House, except where the rate is unlawful—that is, if the rate is confiscatory or deprives the carrier of property without due compensation, in which case the carriers have a right to appeal to the courts under the Constitution, and nobody would or can deprive them of that right. This bill, then, does away with the expensive and slow court machinery provided for in other measures, thus avoiding delay and expense to the shippers, which is, of course, very essential. In this connection I reiterate what I said here a year ago:

> In considering this question there are a few things we are agreed on. First, that it is a question of vital importance to all the American people; second, that some remedy should be given for this universally admitted wrong; third, that Congress has the power and the only power to prescribe the remedy—that is, that the regulation of transportation rates is a legislative function, a function delegated to it under the Constitution, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." That power being delegated to it by the Constitution, Congress can not delegate it to the judiciary or any other branch of this Government. The judiciary has no power to fix rates, nor can it be invested with that power by Congress without a change in our Constitution; and Congress can not change the Constitution. All it can do is to propose amendments to the Constitution, and the amendments must be ratified by the legislatures or conventions of three-fourths of all the States. Nobody has proposed to amend the Constitution, so there is nothing for Congress to do but to shoulder the responsibility; to do its duty; to exercise it prudently, honestly, and with a spirit of justness and fairness to all concerned.
> Being agreed, then, that Congress has the power, and being conscious of our duty to give the desired and just relief, the question is, how shall it be done; how shall we proceed? Of course, everybody fully appreciates that it is a physical impossibility for Congress as a body to examine, investigate, determine, and prescribe transportation rates, but we are agreed that Congress may delegate that power to a commission and not to a judiciary. This seems to be the only feasible plan that has been suggested. The question, then, is to what commission; the next, how much power shall be given the commission? I think the Interstate Commerce Commission is the proper one, a commission, I believe, made up of men of integrity, intelligence, sound judgment, who have had extensive experience, and who are more competent to deal with the question than any new commission or tribunal. In fact, they are experts. If they were not such when appointed, they have become such through long service. They are men learned in the law. We have this Commission, maintaining it at large expense, and, as somebody has suggested, it is now more ornamental than useful. In view of its experience and ability, I believe this Commission should be given exclusive power, after full investigation and hearing, to determine and prescribe what to them seems just and reasonable rates.
> It should be given mandatory power, so that when it has once determined what a reasonable rate is, and has so ordered, it can enforce its findings. I believe that its findings should be final so far as the question of reasonableness and justness of rates is concerned, and not be subject to judicial review, except as to its lawfulness.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this bill comes to us with a unanimous report and will probably pass with practically a unanimous vote, it would hardly seem necessary to argue this question at length. However, this is an old bedfellow and a subject which I have given considerable thought and attention, and, in view of the importance of the question, I may be pardoned for briefly referring to this important subject. It is a broad subject. Viewing it from a financial and business standpoint, I believe it to be one of the greatest questions confronting the American people to-day. It is vital, as it concerns the progress, prosperity, and happiness of the American people. You can not buy or build a barn, fence, sidewalk, or house, or procure a week, month, or year's subsistence except a large portion of the cost goes to pay for transportation; in fact, the price of everything you have to buy or sell is affected by the cost of transportation. The last year or two we have heard a great deal about the tariff, reciprocity, and other questions. These are indeed important and are worthy of the most careful, conscientious, and friendly consideration; but in my opinion at the present time they are of small import as compared with the regulation of transportation rates.

The total customs duties collected in any year is less than $300,000,000. Add to that, if you will, the internal revenue—something over $200,000,000—and in all we will only have about $500,000,000. The preliminary report made by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year ending June 30, 1905, gives the gross receipts of 752 operating companies, representing a mileage of 214,477.82, which is presumably about 99 per cent of the mileage that will be subsequently covered by returns in final report for the same year, at more than $2,000,000,000. The gross earnings of these railroads were: Earnings from the passenger service, $572,109,366, or 27.60 per cent; earnings from the freight service, $1,449,183,702, or 69.90 per cent; other miscellaneous earnings, $51,885,257, or 2½ per cent, a total of $2,073,177,325, or an average of $9,666 per mile of line. The gross receipts then of the railroad companies are about four times the total customs duties and internal revenues.

There are nearly one and one-half times the amount of our exports, twice the amount of our imports, and almost equal to our foreign commerce. They are two times the amount of our public debt, and nearly three times the amount of our annual appropriations by Congress.

Our able and distinguished Speaker, in assuming his duties as Speaker of this House, I believe called our attention to the fact that we have 512,000 manufacturing establishments in the United States, employing 6,000,000 people, and paying them annually $3,000,000,000 in wages, and turning out products annually valued at $13,000,000,000, which is 34 per cent of all the manufactured products of the world. The gross receipts of the railroad companies in a single year are over one-seventh of this amount. They are five times the value of the total output of the gold mines of the world last year.

A few years ago the American people, especially our Democratic friends, were much alarmed about our money circulation. We then had a billion and one-half in circulation. The circulation has increased to $2,680,629,932. It is now $31.88 per capita, a large amount indeed; but the gross receipts of the railroad companies for fifteen months, or their net profits for two and one-half years, would absorb every dollar of it. The American people are proud of this nation's rapid increase of wealth, and of the fact that we have 25 per cent of the wealth of the world. The increase from 1860 to 1900 was from $16,000,000,000 to $94,000,000,000. It is now believed to be over $100,000,000,000, an increase of $84,000,000,000 in forty-six years. The gross receipts of the railroads for a single year, or the net earnings for two years, exceed the average increase of the wealth of the United States for the last forty-six years. The total exports of the world are $10,000,000,000. The gross receipts of the railroad companies are one-fifth of this amount.

The gentleman has just referred to the bank failures and bankruptcy in Iowa and the depressed agricultural conditions. Let me say the tillers of the soil in that great Commonwealth, the greatest agricultural State in the Union, gives to the wealth of the world annually upward of $400,000,000. The net earnings of the railroad companies is more than two and one-half times this amount. According to the Federal census of 1900, in the United States there are nearly 6,000,000 families engaged in agriculture; and out of the 29,000,000 people engaged in gainful occupations more than 10,000,000 are engaged in agriculture; farming lands valued at $13,000,000,000, with improvements valued at $3,500,000,000, or all farm property valued at $20,500,000,000. According to the Interstate Commerce Commission's report, only 1,296,121 persons are employed by the railroads. The value of all railroad property is probably not more than $7,000,000,000.

Turn to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1905. First, he calls our attention to this year of unsurpassed prosperity of the farmers of the country. Production has never been equaled. Its value has reached the highest figure yet attained. Corn has reached its highest production, with 2,708,000,000 bushels, valued at $1,216,000,000; wheat, 684,000,000 bushels, valued at $525,000,000; oats, 939,000,000 bushels, valued at $282,000,000; barley, 133,000,000 bushels, valued at $58,000,000, a total of $2,081,000,000. Add to this, if you will, the hay, valued at $605,000,000; cotton, including seed, valued at $575,000,000; potatoes, valued at $138,000,000; tobacco, $52,000,000; sugar cane and sugar beet, $50,000,000; rice, $13,892,000; dairy products, $665,000,000; poultry products, half a million, and we have a grand total of $4,180,392,000.

The gross receipts of the railroad companies for two years is equal to the value of these products. We find seven men employed on the farms to every one employed in transportation services; $3 invested in agriculture to every dollar invested in railroads, yet the gross receipts of these roads is equal to one-half of the estimated value of these products of the farms during this year of unsurpassed agricultural prosperity and high prices.

But you say that gross receipts have nothing to do with this question. Well, you must deal with gross receipts before we know what net profits are. The same report gives the operating expenses at $1,383,584,404, or $6,451 per mile; thus the net earnings, or income from operation, was $689,592,921. To this should be added $114,636,642, income from investments, such as stocks, bonds, and other miscellaneous sources, which makes a total of $804,229,564.

This amount will probably be largely increased when you deduct from the operating expenses and add to the net earnings items charged to operating expenses and which are not legitimate operating charges—for instance, the amount appropriated for permanent improvements, new concrete and iron bridges, better and new equipments, new turntables, side tracks, stations and roundhouses, lowering grades, straightening curves, which are not proper charges against operating expenses. When the money thus appropriated has been credited to the net earnings there would then probably be a billion dollars profits. Some have estimated the net earnings of all the railroads much higher, but we will proceed along conservative lines, and for the sake of argument will assume the net earnings of the railroad companies to be $1,000,000,000.

Now, a word as to valuation of railroad property. I do not agree with statements made on this floor by some distinguished gentlemen, and statements made by college professors and others in literature furnished us by railroad companies, fixing the valuation at from ten to fourteen billion dollars. This same report gives the par value of railroad property outstanding June 30, 1904, at $13,213,124,679, which represents a capitalization of $64,265 per mile. This includes all negotiable securities, such as stock and funded debts issued by railroad corporations. It reports $6,339,899,329 as stock, of which $5,050,529,469 was common, $1,289,369,860 preferred, and the remaining part, $6,873,225,350, funded debt. Deduct from this two and one-quarter billion stocks and bonds owned by railroad companies and we will have a capitalization of only about $11,000,000,000, and everybody, of course, knows that this is in excess of the real value of railroad property, and know that many of these stocks and bonds contain more wind, printer's ink, and water than they do cash. Experts and reliable and conservative men estimate the real value of railroad property at from ten to twenty-five thousand dollars per mile, and the most liberal from $25,000 to $35,000 per mile. If it be, say, $30,000 per mile, and there are 220,000 miles of main-line road, the value of all railroad property would be about $6,600,000,000, and the net profits on railroad investments would be about 15 per cent.

I submit to you, Is this a fair division of profits—that is, giving to railroad companies a profit equal to one-half of the amount of the average increase of wealth of the United States for these years, an amount equal to one-fourth of these farm products referred to, an amount equal to two-fifths of our money circulation, an amount almost equal to one-half of our foreign commerce, while their property is equal to only about one-fifteenth of the wealth of the United States and they employ only one person for every thirty-two employed in the United States? If so, then you may contend that there is no immediate necessity for legislation. Or if you believe that the earnings of the roads should be increased in order to pay dividends and interest on all watered stocks and bonds, and that the managers of the roads are more considerate, generous, fair, and just in fixing rates than an impartial commission would be that can and will be accomplished by giving the roads, as they have had in the past, full swing and power to fix rates. On the other hand, if you believe that the railroads are getting more than their share, and more than they ought to have, and that they should receive just and fair treatment, and no more, then we should delegate the power of fixing rates to an impartial commission.

Mr. Chairman, I want to enter a protest against this salary grab—increasing the membership of the Commission to seven and increasing the salaries from $7,500 to $10,000. This is, in my estimation, unnecessary, unwarranted, unjust, and extravagant.

At the rate we are building up stalls in the public crib and providing soft berths, as has been stated, for superannuated Senators, for friends and broken-down or antiquated politicians, where are we going to stop? Our annual appropriations already exceed $800,000,000. It has been more than $6,000,000,000 the last four Congresses—an amount equal to one-half of all the farm property in the United States or one-fifteenth of the wealth of the United States in 1900, according to the Federal census. The appropriations for the last five Congresses in the aggregate is more than one-half the total value of our manufactured products. It is in excess of the total present value of all railroad property. What has become of these promises to restrict appropriations? Where does retrenchment and reform come in? Where are these men who profess to be the dear and near friends of the people, who proclaimed so loudly during the campaigns and their stay at home "down with excessive expenditures; apply economy in making appropriations?" Are you going to remain here in your seats, as you have in the past, silent as the grave, forget your promises, and keep on voting for every increase? If so, what is the limit? The fact that the regulation of rates by the Government is important does not make the work difficult, and is no reason for increase of salary. The fixing of rates it not a difficult task. President Stickney, of the Great Western, one who knows more about this subject than all of us put together, says the making of rate schedules is the function of clerks and not of high-priced traffic managers or directors. Let me read to you what he says:

I also take issue with the committee's conclusions about the requirements of exact knowledge in making such a schedule. This is also a point which is strenuously urged against conferring the rate-making authority upon the Commission at this time. The assumption seems to be that there are only a few men who possess the exact knowledge required, and presumably, owing to the relation of the supply to the demand, such exact knowledge can only be obtained by paying extraordinary salaries, far in excess of the salaries which Congress would be willing to provide.

A Government commission in making rates would be untrammeled by competition or a desire to secure tonnage for any particular line, and would therefore be able to frame its schedule by square rule, instead of scribe rule. That it does not require high-priced exact knowledge to make a schedule of square-rule rates is conclusively proven by the fact that fourteen years ago the railway commission of Iowa, consisting of unskilled men, each drawing a salary of about $3,000 per annum, in a few months' time, mostly occupied in hearing the protest of the railway companies, made a square-rule schedule of rates in Iowa, and in the same year the commissioners of Illinois, like unskilled men, made a square-rule schedule of State rates for Illinois, both of which schedules have been used during all these years, practically without change.

Here is an example of practically one schedule of rates made by State commissioners, covering two great States, having more junction and competitive points than any other equal area in the world, which has been satisfactory, without change for more than fourteen consecutive years. While, on the other hand, the interstate schedules, made by traffic experts, under the stress of competition and a desire on the part of each to get some advantage over the other, which affected the interstate traffic of the same two States, have been changed, during the same time, by filing with the Interstate Commission probably not less than eight to ten thousand schedules.

I repeat what I said a year ago:

Why increase the membership and salaries of this Commission? Gentlemen, I venture the assertion that Uncle Sam now has among his thousands of employees more than a hundred men working at a salary of less than half what these Commissioners are now paid, any five of whom are capable of doing the work of this Commission. As stated by President Stickney, the making of rate schedules is the function of clerks, and not high-priced traffic managers or directors. Some fourteen years ago the Iowa legislature created a railroad commission, consisting of three members, unskilled men, and in a few months, the largest part of that time occupied in hearing the protests of the railroad companies, fixed rates for that State. Illinois did the same. A schedule of rates was made by the commissioners covering two great States having more junctions and competitive points than any other equal area in the world, which has been satisfactory without change for more than fourteen consecutive years.

The whole work of the Iowa commission was practically completed in a very few months, relieving it from official duties and enabling the members to remain at their homes and direct and attend to their own business affairs, leaving the office duties to a clerk. In fact, the commission has had so little to do that the Iowa legislature reduced their salaries from $3,000 to $2,200; and it has been suggested that if the amount of salary is to be considered in connection with the amount of work it would be safe to reduce it another thousand dollars, and that they would then be paid more per hour for the hours given to the work than Members of Congress, and I believe it would be safe to say more than the President of the United States. I do not bring this up to reflect on the commission. But they are men, I believe, of ability, energy, and integrity. But I bring it up to show that the work is not there, and to show that neither experts nor high-priced men are required. It requires men of integrity, sound judgment, energy, and ability.

Much has been said about this legislation affecting the wage-earners employed by transportation companies. The contention is that if Congress will delegate the power of fixing rates to a commission, that the wage-earner will suffer thereby by having his wages reduced by the carriers. Of all the absurd objections raised this is certainly the most absurd of all. To begin with, no bill, to my knowledge, has been introduced or considered proposing to give the power of fixing wages to any commission. Even if that were the proposition, I believe the interests of the wage-earners of this country would be as well subserved by an uninterested commission as they would at the hands of the railroad companies. I believe that they have confidence in our great and worthy President—that he will appoint a commission composed of men of ability, judgment, integrity, with pure motives, and whose ambition and desire will be to do justice to all concerned. But they say the Commission will reduce rates, thereby reducing the profits of the roads, and that the railroad companies will in turn reduce the wages of employees in order to make up the loss in profits.

Let us see. The bill provides that rates must be remunerative; the Constitution protects the carriers against confiscation or taking of property without compensation; the courts have held that the railroads are entitled to a reasonable profit on their investment; so the Commission in fixing rates must make allowances for a reasonable profit to the carrier. If wages are reduced and profits thereby increased, the rates must be reduced. If wages are increased and profits thereby reduced, the rates may be increased.

Before the Commission can determine what just and reasonable rates are, what will be necessary for it to ascertain? First, the valuation of railroad property, the gross receipts, the actual and legitimate operating expenses, and the net profits. It must also determine what is a reasonable profit. Deduct that from the net profits of the roads and you have the excessive profits; and a reduction of rates will be ordered accordingly. For instance, the Commission finds the value of railroad property to be six billion, the gross receipts two billion, actual and legitimate operating expenses one billion, leaving as net profits $1,000,000,000; and suppose that the Commission should decide that the railroads would be entitled to 10 per cent on this valuation, or $600,000,000.

Deducting this $600,000,000 from $1,000,000,000 net profit, it would leave $400,000,000 as excessive profit. Four hundred million dollars being 20 per cent of the $2,000,000,000 gross receipts, the Commission would order a reduction of 20 per cent of the present rate, such reduction reducing the net profits to $600,000,000, the amount decided by the Commission to be a just and reasonable profit. The railroads in turn would reduce the wages of its employees $100,000,000, and at the end of the year the railroad would have $700,000,000 profit, but according to the Commission's decision they are entitled to only $600,000,000. What would be the result? The Commission would say to the carrier, "Reduce your rates $100,000,000." Is there any question in the mind of anybody what the railroads would do in this event? They would certainly restore the wages and not reduce rates. They would have nothing to lose by increasing the wages, but would have much to gain. It would enable them to secure the most skilled and efficient labor, which is conducive to the safety of the public and best interests of the railroad companies.

Again, suppose after the Commission has determined upon this $600,000,000 as a reasonable profit and on a reduction of $400,000,000 excessive profit that the railroad companies should say they proposed to increase the wages of their employees $100,000,000. The Commission would then be compelled to make this $100,000,000 allowance, as it has no jurisdiction over the fixing of wages, and in place of ordering a reduction of $400,000,000 it could only order a reduction of $300,000,000, as the Constitution provides that a railroad company can not be deprived of its property without compensation, and the courts have held that they are entitled to a reasonable profit on their investments. With the safeguards under this bill, and with the protection the carriers have under the Constitution, and as there would be nothing to gain in decreasing wages, but much to gain by increasing them in securing more efficient and reliable service, there can be no question but that the tendency would be to increase instead of decrease wages.

The fact of the case is the Government, exercising its power to regulate rates, takes away the very incentive to reduce wages by transportation companies.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] and others have spoken of the railroads and the part they have taken in the development of this country. But this country has done something for the railroads also. How about the right of eminent domain, the land grants—concessions made to the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, and other roads? Truly it can be said that this Government—the Congress—has been kind and generous to the railroads. How about Congress granting a charter to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or its promoters, giving the right of way through public lands, stone, timber, and other material for the construction of the road; the 23,000,000 acres of land, the iron and coal found within 10 miles of the track, and other donations and concessions aggregating $80,000,000?

It loaned the credit of this Government to the extent of about $52,000,000, or sixteen, thirty-two, and forty-eight thousand dollars per mile, taking a first mortgage on the line, rolling stock, fixtures, and other property. The franchise and donations granted by Congress aggregated $80,000,000. The road was built for less money than the money realized out of the bonds, giving these enterprising and patriotic promoters some $30,000,000 profit. They were not satisfied with this, but two years later appeared before Congress, saying, "You have been very kind and generous to us; you loaned us more money than was required to build our road; but we are in need of some more money; we can borrow this money on a first mortgage; will you be kind enough to release your claim, and authorize us to mortgage our road for an amount equal to the amount you loaned us, and you take a second mortgage for the amount due you?" This request was also promptly and cheerfully granted. The Government then held a second mortgage on a piece of property mortgaged in advance largely in excess of its cost and value. So Congress and this Government have been generous, accommodating, and liberal with railroads. It is true that the Government has been recouped to the extent of the amount of the bonds. Every dollar has been paid into the United States Treasury, but who paid it? The people patronizing the road and those living along the line. Yet we hear a great deal about what the railroads have done for this country, and what would the country be without the railroads. That is not the question. You might as well ask the question, What would the railroads be without this country? The question is, What is right or wrong in the matter, and what are the rights of the people as well as of the railroads? Everybody concedes that the railroads have been a great benefit to this country in the building up of our towns, villages, farms, our cities, factories, and mills; in fact, the whole country; but these are not altogether the achievements of the railroad companies. The 80,000,000 American people have contributed something toward the upbuilding of this great and glorious country. Are not those who have built our public works, our roads, our bridges, who have constructed the vast system of public schools, those who have built our State and national institutions, our temples of religion and charitable institutions, worthy of some consideration. Those who in poverty, in distress, in sickness, in health, in prosperity and adversity, each sympathizing with the other's woes and sharing each other's joys, step by step have advanced along the lines of civilization, accumulation of wealth, and refinement? Some of these achievements are certainly due in a large degree to their pluck, energy, brains, foresight, and good judgment. Truly it can be said that the citizens of the United States rank among the most successful, practical, and most enlightened of any country. Their onward march to true greatness has placed them in the foremost ranks of modern civilization and refinement. These towns and villages, farms, manufactories, great institutions, societies, our public schools, the morality and industry of her citizens, are not altogether the achievements of the railroads; they are results due to the energy, integrity, sound judgment, and profound wisdom of the American people. They bear upon them the impress of the most enlightened views and policies executed with the greatest prudence, firmness, and wisdom. They are the trophies of freedom and the grandest monument to our national glory.

These are the people who, for their self-protection and interest, are asking for this legislation. Are they and those who favor the passage of this bill to be characterized as socialists and charged with a desire to confiscate railroad property or destroy this great industry? Without reflecting on the integrity or motives of those opposing this measure, I trust they will be liberal enough to concede that those supporting this measure possess the same degree of integrity and respect for property rights. I yield to no man in this respect.

I deprecate any and all efforts to destroy property, to deprive railroads or any legitimate enterprise of their rights and what is fair and just. I take as much pride in these railroads, in the splendid equipment and excellent service they give, as anyone.

We all take a just and pardonable pride in this nation's growth and greatness; in the fact that we live in this age of such marvelous expansion and are moving forward at such a mighty pace; that the wheels of industry are moving, every spindle spinning, the anvils ringing, the forges blazing in such large numbers, and that every energy is employed all over this land; and that progress and prosperity are in evidence everywhere. Every man's duty, no matter what his political affiliation, his creed, or occupation, or whatever his prejudices may be, is to strive to benefit this country, protect the weak, relieve the distressed, uplift humanity, advance civilization, progress, and happiness; to promote and perpetuate true greatness. Let us all give thoughtful and careful consideration to secure the full benefit for our natural resources, our developed mechanical appliances, the skill and genius of our wageworkers; let us see to it that the American farmer, the shipper, the jobber, the merchant, the manufacturer and his workmen are not discriminated against and imposed upon, but that they are given adequate protection against this invasion of unscrupulous and powerful interests, which compel them to pay involuntary tribute to the common carriers which in the aggregate amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars. All shippers, small dealers, large dealers, all towns, villages, cities, manufacturers, merchants, farmers, and jobbers should receive like treatment; that is, common carriers should charge a like amount for like services under similar conditions.

I believe, in view of the importance of the question, in view of the provisions of the Constitution, the decisions of the courts, the opinions of the Attorneys-General, the power which Congress has under the Constitution to regulate rates, and the fact that our present Commission has no power to fix rates and enforce its findings, the law having been made ineffective, competition eliminated, and that a few—less than a dozen men—have in the past and do now exercise exclusive power in fixing rates, and that they have abused that power to an alarming extent, Congress will be justified in enacting some just law that will give effective results, a law protecting the rights of the people as well as the railroads, dealing with the question judiciously and in a broad and comprehensive manner, in a spirit of fairness and justice to all concerned. Not legislation such as has been represented to conservative, honest, and upright people to frighten them and to enlist them in opposition to legislation; but conservative, judicious, and sound legislation. Not to destroy or confiscate railroad property, or to meet the demands of those who would destroy both property and government, and have no respect for property rights; not to meet the demands of demagogues, socialists, or those howling in and out of season for any and all things that might further their individual interests or gratify their ambitions; but to meet the demands of those who believe in proceeding in a dignified manner to promote commerce, farming, justice, advancement, advantage, blessings, happiness, comfort, convenience, progress, and prosperity to all the people, to all communities, and to all legitimate enterprises; and to meet the demand of those who contribute to and believe in maintaining this nation's growth and greatness; those who insist that their rights should be respected; that equal rights be given to all so far as possible, as provided for in the Constitution. We want no legislation to retard growth, progress, and prosperity, but to promote it; not a step backward, but forward. Legislation that will promote happiness and give equal rights to all people, such as is advocated by those who believe in stability, dignity, peace, this grand and glorious Government and its splendid and magnificent institutions. We want legislation, such as this bill, that will give to the people stable and equitable rates, do away with discriminations, rebates, unreasonable rates, abuses in private cars and car lines, terminals, and terminal charges, and compel the furnishing of equal facilities to all, in order that we may have the fullest development of all worthy and legitimate business enterprises. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield sixty minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES].

[Mr. GAINES of West Virginia addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this privilege of recognition for the purpose of making only one brief observation. I had intended to content myself with registering my vote in favor of this bill, together with the large majority of the membership of this House upon both sides. The members of the majority and of the minority of that important committee which has jurisdiction of this question has discharged its duty with fidelity and with loyalty to the subject-matter which they had in hand and with the due consideration of its importance which it deserved.

There has, however, been one proposition emphasized in this debate which has induced me to make a brief observation. My distinguished colleague from my own State [Mr. PAGE], with others, has given expression to the idea that if the laws upon the statute book already existing, which have been enacted from time to time, had been given efficacy, if prosecutions had been instituted upon them—in other words, if the executive department, including, primarily, the Department of Justice, had at all times discharged their duty, then there would not be the same demand for legislation of this character, looking to the regulation of rates as they exist to-day. This statement is absolutely true, in my judgment. I have heard panegyrics passed upon the distinguished occupant of the Presidential chair. I, with these gentlemen, entertain a natural pride, a pride that should be common to every American citizen, in the true Americanism, in the integrity, in the faculty of initiative, and the zeal and diligence with which he endeavors to carry into effect every policy which he espouses; but these encomiums, Mr. Chairman, have at the same time carried with them something of disparagement of the legislative department of this Government. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is no legislative body upon earth which is more easily responsive to public opinion, where the individual members with greater loyalty and zeal endeavor to interpret correctly the views of their constituents than is the case with the House of Representatives.

At all times I believe the membership of this House, representing as they do a diversity of interests and sections, are at all times ready to respond and mold and to enact into law that which shall truly represent and which shall be a true response to the public sentiment of the country at large. I believe, therefore, that when there is occasionally an occupant of the Executive chair, in a moment of patriotism and loyalty to his duty, who takes into his mind to execute a law, or to press upon the attention of Congress an amendment of the existing law, while praise should be due to such Executive, yet at the same time it should be remembered that the legislative department of our Government is never recreant to their duty, but always ready to respond to public opinion and to sane and healthy public sentiment upon every occasion. This legislation which is before this committee is an illustration of this proposition. It is fortunate, I think, that this legislation was postponed until this session. This bill of the committee is a wiser bill than was presented, either by the majority or minority members of the committee, during the last Congress. It is more comprehensive in its scope, more widespread in its effect, and will be more beneficial in its results. It shows the wisdom of delay and of taking into conference the people of the United States and of giving them due and careful consideration in a question like this.

What I desire to say may be summed up in this expression: That in giving praise to the Executive we ought at the same time to recollect the fact that upon every occasion where public duty has demanded its effort the legislative department of our Government, represented in this House, has never failed at the proper time and in a proper way to discharge its duty. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is one of very great importance both to the railroads and to the American people. For more than thirty years the subject of rate legislation has engaged the attention of the country to a greater or less extent.

In the early days of railroad building it was not supposed that the time would ever come when it would be necessary to enact laws in order to protect the people from the railroads.

Seventy-five years ago railroad building in the United States was in its infancy, and thirty years ago railroad mileage only amounted to about 75,000 miles, and there was little agitation looking to the regulation by law of railroad transportation rates.

The following table shows railroad development in the United States:

In 1882 the total gross receipts of the railroads in the United States was $764,231,399.

In 1905 the gross receipts exceeded $2,000,000,000.

A half century ago railroad mileage was comparatively insignificant, and now every section of this country is traversed by more than 214,000 miles of railroad.

The prosperity and welfare of the people of the United States depends to a greater extent upon securing proper transportation rates than on any other one thing. An increase of 25 per cent in the transportation charges by railroads would bankrupt one-half of the farmers, and even a larger per cent than this of the manufacturers and other business interests of the country.

Unrestrained by law, as at present, the railroads have it in their power to produce financial and industrial paralysis at any time.

Of course it is argued, and properly argued, that the railroads will not do this; but it is also true that the policy of railroads in recent years has been to increase rates, and wherever an excuse could be found for so doing, and often an increase has been made when apparently there was no reason for it other than that the money was wanted.

Railroads are not private corporations. On the contrary, they have always been denominated quasi public, and by many late writers are called "public corporations."

The entire business of a railroad corporation is with the public. The rights and privileges granted to them are numerous and valuable, and amongst the most important of the rights exercised by railroads is that of eminent domain.

I hope that I may be excused for stating here that a great deal of the fault for existing conditions, making it necessary that Congress take action, is to be laid to the individual States. Practically all of the railroads are creatures of the States in that they hold State charters. No one doubts that if the States in granting charters had imposed conditions on the railroads such as would safeguard the interests of the public, and particularly in the matter of preventing overcapitalization, improper issues of stocks and bonds, and providing for publicity, that many of the evils now complained of could not exist.

The right of a State to control freight and passenger charges within the State is supreme, it being understood, of course, that no State has the right to impose such conditions as will amount to confiscating the property of the railroads.

In practically all of the States statutes have been passed looking to the control of railroads, and in many States giving to boards or commissioners the power to fix rates; and I call attention to the fact that in no State, to my knowledge, has the action of the State authorities in regulating the rates to be charged by the railroads for transportation proven confiscatory or in any serious sense harmful to the railroads.

In 1892 the general assembly of my State passed a law creating a board of railroad commissioners, conferring plenary powers on the board in the matter of rate making.

I was a member of the State senate at the time and remember that the argument was made that if this power was given to the commission that the railroads would be denied their rights, robbed of their property, and railroad values destroyed in South Carolina. I was a member of the committee having the bill under consideration. This argument did not impress me, although the majority of the committee was impressed. I was one of the minority making a favorable report.

The bill was passed and no harm has resulted to the railroads on this account.

State control, or regulation, as is well understood, can not affect interstate commerce. Statistics show that about 25 per cent of the railroad traffic is within the States, and something like 75 per cent is interstate, so that if there is a necessity for State control over transportation rates within the States the necessity for control of interstate transportation should be three times as great.

The table cited by me shows the gross traffic earnings of the railroads from 1882 down to and including 1903; and in this connection I wish to call attention to the fact that the table relative to passengers and freight carried by the railroads shows that since 1898 the average receipts per passenger per mile and the average receipts per ton per mile for freight have increased annually, so that the contention is correct that the tendency on the part of the railroads has been to increase rates.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments of the distinguished gentlemen who opposed the passage of this bill on the ground that it is revolutionary, a step in the direction of socialism, sans-culottism, and eventual government ownership.

In answer to this I suggest that state control has not produced any growth of sentiment in favor of government ownership.

The evils to be corrected are, briefly speaking, discriminations as between shippers and between communities, rebates granted to favored shippers, refrigerator and icing charges, the private car line abuses, and, in many instances, high rates.

These abuses may be said to be confined to freight transportation. There is an abuse, however, relating to passenger carriage which, in my judgment, can not be condemned too strongly.

It is estimated that nearly 20 per cent of the passenger traffic is carried free—that is, that one-fifth of the passengers, in miles traveled, ride on free passes or free transportation.

The railroads can and should correct this abuse. It is not to be expected that the railroads can carry 20 per cent of their passengers free without imposing the cost upon the 80 per cent who pay.

To illustrate, if this abuse should be corrected, the 80 per cent who do not ride free would pay 20 per cent less than they now pay. The railroad companies would perform the same service now performed, and their passenger receipts would be the same as at present.

The charge has been made by some that any law giving to a commission the right under any circumstances to fix rates will in its operations prove confiscatory to the railroads.

Any argument of this character must necessarily be based on the proposition that ownership of railroad property is entitled to be treated, under all circumstances and in all respects, the same as ownership of any other property; that the owner of a railroad should be no more restrained than the owner of a farm, store, or factory.

This argument is untenable and not for a moment to be seriously considered in this the beginning of the twentieth century, no matter how reasonable the argument may have been fifty years ago. Conditions have changed.

Then the population of this country was 23,191,876; now it is about 83,000,000. Then the total wealth was $6,024,666,909; now the aggregate wealth of the United States exceeds $100,000,000,000. In 1850 the value of all farm property amounted to less than $4,000,000,000, and now to more than $23,000,000,000. So that we have the States, each controlling the operations of railroads within its jurisdiction, and section 8, subdivision 3, of Article I of the Constitution of the United States expressly confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States.

It is worthy of note that section 8 also gives to Congress the power to provide for the general welfare of the United States, and I am of the opinion that, without the numerous decisions of the courts, the two provisions taken together are broad enough to amply answer in the affirmative all questions of doubt as to the right of Congress to pass the bill now under consideration, giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix the rate for the transportation of passengers and freight under certain circumstances.

Hence it is we have a uniform line of decisions, too numerous to mention, that Congress has such power.

We have, then, in the consideration of the bill, to decide: First, is the legislation necessary? Second, is the proposed legislation within the power of Congress to pass? And the first two questions being answered in the affirmative, is the bill under consideration ample in its provisons to correct evils and abuses practiced by common carriers?

There has been some contention to the effect that it would be better for Congress to provide a court to take the place of the Inerstate Commerce Commission. This, it seems to me, in the light of the decisions, is an untenable position, for the reason that rate making is a legislative and not a judicial act.

Some who have advocated this believe that then a resort to the courts for a review of the rates fixed would, to a large extent, be avoided.

Believing this view to be erroneous, I am satisfied that the Supreme Court of the United States would adhere to the doctrine that rate making does not belong to the judiciary, and if so, then all legislation enacted by Congress, on that theory, would fall to the ground.

Mr. Justice Brewer, in the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., 362), held, as a general proposition, that rate making by a governmental agency to be observed by common carriers is a legislative or administrative rather than a judicial function, and he further decided that the courts can not revise or change the rates imposed by legislature or a commission.

Mr. Chairman, I am unable to add much if anything to what has been said in this Congress and the last in the discussion of this great question. I do not claim to be an expert in the matter of rate legislation.

I believe, however, that when the present bill has been in operation for a year the verdict of the American people will be that Congress has not gone far enough, that sufficient power has not been lodged in the hands of the Commission.

It will be observed that the bill under consideration does not give the Commission power to initiate rates. This power will be found necessary to secure satisfactory results.

I am also of the opinion that it does not include express companies and Pullman cars, and why it should not has not yet been answered. This defect should be cured by amendment. Section 15 of the bill under consideration contains the only provision for rate making by the Commission.

The Commission is authorized, after full hearing upon a complaint charging that the rate is unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial or otherwise in violation of the provisions of the act, to decide what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter the maximum rate.

It will be observed that any rate fixed by the Commission must be fairly remunerative. It is a matter of common knowledge that many rates imposed by railroads require regulation, because they are unjust and unreasonable, etc., when at the same time the rate complained of could probably be proved to be unremunerative.

I have not time to go into a full analysis of the bill, but I am satisfied that it confers, practically speaking, minimum power upon the Commission in the matter of rate making.

I desire to say now that if this bill shall be found inoperative, practically speaking, because in its provisions power enough is not granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the fault will be found in the language quoted, because it may be that a railroad will have a rate in practice that is unjust and unreasonable and discriminatory, but at the same time a rate higher than that would not be a fairly remunerative rate. I believe that the language of the bill in this respect might be improved. I hope that I am wrong. If I am, time will show it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I am trying to get that word "remunerative" defined by us at least. Suppose a rate is reasonable and just to the people and under the present law reasonable and just to the railroads.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is, that the railroad gets paid for the quality and amount of work it does and is paid a reasonable and just rate, but this law is passed and that rate becomes unreasonable and unjust to the people, and a less rate than that would not be fairly remunerative. Will the gentleman tell me now what the Commission would do under this law and what the courts would do in defining the judgment of the Commission in such a case?

Mr. FINLEY. I am apprehensive that in a case like that, when the Commission investigated the matter and found the rate to be unjust and unreasonable but that a higher rate would not be fairly remunerative, the Interstate Commerce Commission would be powerless to do anything. I am afraid of that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is what I have had in mind all the time, that the rate is reasonable and just to the people, and yet it is not fairly remunerative, and therefore it has got to be raised to take care of the railroad.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I do not see how the expressions "reasonable and just" and "fairly remunerative" or "remunerative" can be paralleled so as to work, you may say, with any congeniality. It is imperfect.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from South Carolina will pardon me a moment, I would suggest to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee that he propound that question to the gentleman near him, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He has not yet taken the floor. I hope I shall have the opportunity of having him explain that when he does take the floor, because I want to say that I have gone and looked at all the dictionaries and none, with the exception of Burrill and Bouvier, undertake to give a definition of it. Burrill defines it as "compensation and salary."

Mr. FINLEY. I am inclined to believe that any rate, that all rates, put into force by the Commission provided for in this bill must be such rates as will be fairly remunerative to the railroads. That is my impression; that is my belief. If that is right and if I am correct in that, then they have no power to promulgate any other rate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It must be fairly remunerative even if it is unjust and unreasonable to the people.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, how can it be?

Mr. FINLEY. That is something, I have no doubt, the courts of this country will be called upon to decide in the years to come in the event that this bill becomes a law. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Interstate Commerce is to be commended upon the conservatism displayed in the presentation of the subject-mater now before the House. It is evident that the consideration given to it has been along the lines of justice. It seems to me that they have endeavored, in preparing this bill, to do equal justice to every interest. The men who own the railroads are citizens of the country, and their interests are as important as those of the citizens engaged in other lines of endeavor. There is no man anywhere to be found who believes in confiscating the property of the railroads. No man to whom I have talked desires any unjust legislation. The only thing that is desired, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is that the interests of the public be safeguarded against the possible unjust use of the power centered in the railroads of the country.

The time was when everybody was for everything the railroads wanted. When the railroads were first constructed in short lines, they in a measure served the people's needs, and when the short lines were extended into great trunk lines they increased the service to the people, and everybody was overjoyed because pioneer railroad builders had sufficient enterprise and confidence in the country's future to invest money in their construction.

But when a few men became the owners of all the railroads and they were directed from Wall street, the people began to fear that the power thus centralized might be used arbitrarily; that the men who controlled this power might become arrogant, impudent, and oppressive, and to prevent this the present legislation was evolved.

We all realize that but for railroads the incomparable resources of our soil and the superior ingenuity of our people would never have been realized. As President Roosevelt well said in his message to Congress December 3, 1901:

> They are the arteries through which the commercial lifeblood of the nation flows.

But if by unwise care and management some of these lifeblood-bearing arteries have become impaired we should not, in applying remedies for their betterment and for their future regulation, administer doses so potent and unnatural as to cause a paralysis of the entire system. We should deal with the patient justly but firmly. To begin with, he should be made to understand that total abstinence from those indiscretions which brought on the disease must be adhered to, and that any future attempt to violate, even in the slightest degree, rules laid down for his observance and obedience will be summarily dealt with.

I do not favor rate regulations, Mr. Chairman, which will prove confiscatory, but I would, by some fair and effective method, deal with the question so as to do justice to all concerned.

The fact that railroads have given to the country blessings which are great and salutary does not justify their devotion to all kinds of rate discrimination in order that their intemperate appetite for dividends may be satisfied, and Congress should not longer delay righting the evils which exist because certain great railroad managers possess a frantic desire to control the universe.

I fully realize my inability to suggest the proper legal remedy, and it is with hesitancy and no little embarrassment that I become a participant in the discussion of a subject so complicated as to perplex and bewilder our most learned and experienced statesmen, and did not the people's interests seem to be threatened by railroad rapacity, I would content myself with a quiet and peaceful reflection upon the subject, and comply strictly with that precedent which so wisely suggests to a new Member of Congress the importance of a mute participation in affairs.

My intrusion upon the time of the House is therefore prompted by the very highest of motives, for dumb in fact is the man who would not raise his voice, weak and powerless though it be, in defense of the people when they cry aloud for the enjoyment of those blessings vouchsafed to them by a wise and beneficent Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, rebates, secret devices, unjust discriminations, and unreasonable rates should be forever prohibited, and some simple but sure way of dealing with questions of this character should be devised and speedily enacted into law.

The power of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be enlarged so as to enable it, subject, of course, to review by the courts, to fix maximum rates that would not be extortionate. I believe that Congress can confer power upon the Commission to determine what the maximum rates should be without violating the Constitution; that is, Congress can, in my opinion, delegate that authority to the Commission.

Of course such power, when exercised by the Commission, would only be valid until set aside by the courts.

But I am no lawyer, Mr. Chairman, and it is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the legal side of the question.

It is my desire to call attention more particularly to the abuses and burdens the people are compelled to suffer in order that a favored few may wax fat under the pernicious system of rate discrimination. I do not mean those people who hope to obtain, through the aid of Congress, success, which lack of energy, honest effort, and ability have failed to secure for them. Such men are neither honest nor just, and they are ever ready to assert whatever suits their own individual purposes. But I refer to those honest people who, dealing fairly with others, demand that they in turn be fairly dealt with. Men who believe in honest competition and who are far more interested in the welfare and protection of property interests in general and in the maintenance of public honesty and decency than they are in the building up of their own business through the aid of rebates and other discriminations to the detriment of others.

Mr. Chairman, it costs 27 cents per hundredweight to ship bacon by freight from Chicago to Lynchburg, Va., a distance of over 1,000 miles. From Lynchburg to Danville, a distance of 65 miles, it costs 40 cents per hundredweight, a difference of 13 cents per hundred pounds.

Matches by the carload, Detroit to Lynchburg, are rated at 24½ cents per 100. The Southern Railroad makes a rate of 47½ cents per 100 on matches to Danville, thereby charging 47½ cents for hauling the same shipment 65 miles which is hauled by other roads over ten times as far for 24 cents.

Why does the Southern Railroad inflict these unreasonable burdens upon the city of Danville? Are they not unreasonable rates? If they are unreasonable rates, why are they tolerated?

Vinegar in carload lots, Chicago to Hot Springs, Ark., a distance of 686 miles, it rated at 33 cents per hundredweight. Vinegar in carload lots, Chicago to Wichita, Kans., a distance of 686 miles, is rated at 48 cents per hundredweight.

Wheat consigned to New York from Lincoln, Nebr., is 38½ cents per hundredweight, while wheat consigned for export through New York is 34 cents per hundredweight.

Paint in carload lots Chicago to Spokane is rated at $1.21 per hundredweight, but the same article Chicago to the Pacific coast, nearly 500 miles farther, is but 90 cents per hundredweight.

The rate on iron from New York to San Francisco is 60 cents per hundred pounds, but if billed to Hongkong via San Francisco the amount received by the railroad is considerably less. The rate from Omaha to Kearney, Nebr., is 30 cents. It is 3,000 miles from New York to San Francisco. The distance from Omaha to Kearney is 200 miles. From New York to San Francisco the traffic passes over the same road that the traffic billed to Kearney does. I am informed that the rate from ocean to ocean is the lowest in the world, and I do not question the truthfulness of that assertion; but I can not quite understand why Kearney should be made to pay an unreasonable rate.

Cotton piece goods from New England to Denver is rated at $2.24 per hundred pounds. Carload lots New England to San Francisco, going through Denver, 1,500 miles farther and passing over two mountain ranges, is rated at $1 per hundred pounds and $1.50 in less than carload lots. The Supreme Court has decided that the Interstate Commerce Commission has no power to correct this condition. Is the Congress of the United States powerless to confer that power?

I have read with considerable interest the decision of the Supreme Court in the so-called "party-rate case." The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company made a rate to a party of gentlemen which was a much lower rate than they would give to a single individual on the same train. The Interstate Commerce Commission held that the rate was illegal, but the Supreme Court decided that the act to regulate commerce did not prevent the application of the principle of wholesale and retail to railroad tariffs. What would the army of small dealers of this country say were the railroads bold enough to apply that decision to the shipment of freight? Does anybody think even for a second that the protest of a few Senators would be sufficient to cause the President to defer calling the Congress together in extraordinary session for the purpose of stopping such an evil? I hardly think so. Under such a decision the small operator would not stand as much show as a grasshopper in a turkey pen.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are discriminations and there are discriminations. Some one has said that exclusive contracts for private car privileges affords the most fruitful source for rate discrimination, and if the statement of Mr. George A. Mead, who appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee on May 17, 1905, can be relied upon, I am constrained to believe that there is some truth in the assertion. After having proceeded for some time, Mr. Mead called the attention of the committee to the following instance merely as an illustration of what certain dealers must contend with that the greed of the fortunate contractor may be satisfied. Mr. Mead said:

> A receiver in Chicago received a carload of tomatoes from a point in Tennessee. I have the exact facts here in a pamphlet, if I can find them. Perhaps I can give them as well as to read them. This party received a carload of tomatoes over a road having an exclusive contract with a private car line. The distance was something like 522 miles, I think, from Gibson, Tenn., and the icing charge for the car was $73.92.
> Senator CULLOM. That was a separate item, so you know what that was?
>
> Mr. MEAD. We know what that was, because the party refused to pay the charge, and a lawsuit was begun.
>
> Senator FORAKER. How long was that car in transit?
>
> Mr. MEAD. I can not tell you. I am not familiar with that section.
>
> Senator KEAN. You said you were familiar with the case.
>
> Mr. MEAD. I am familiar with the facts of the case, but I am not familiar with the distance between these points. My business is in the East, and this case occurred in Tennessee.

Think of it for a moment; under the Armour exclusive contract, from Gibson, Tenn., 522 miles, $73.92; from Memphis, Tenn., 527 miles, practically the same distance, under free refrigerator competition, $15. Now, the difference between $73.92 and $15 is $58.92, and what does that $58.92 represent? It represents an imposition upon the public so intolerable and a traffic situation so unendurable that the exclusive contract which makes these horrible conditions possible must be destroyed and replaced by free and natural competition under the operation of just law.

Senator KEAN. We have had that same instance before.

Mr. MEAD. I think so. That is one of the difficulties under which we have to work. We have to pay the bill in a lump sum, without knowing whether there are any correct refrigerator charges upon it or not.

Senator FORAKER. Can you give the date when that charge was made?

Mr. MEAD. This was brought out at the June hearing last year in Chicago.

Senator FORAKER. Was it shortly prior to that time, or is that some old case?

Mr. MEAD. Oh, no; it was last season.

Senator FORAKER. Something recent?

Mr. MEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator FORAKER. Something in last season's business?

Mr. MEAD. Yes, sir.

Senator CULLOM. Do you know what kind of a car that was—what its capacity was?

Mr. MEAD. It was an Armour car.

Senator KEAN. What was its capacity?

Mr. MEAD. I could not tell; their capacity does not vary very much.

Senator KEAN. What is the capacity of the other car?

Mr. MEAD. About the same.

Senator KEAN. So that you know the capacity of the Armour cars?

Mr. MEAD. They do not vary to amount to anything.

Senator CULLOM. What was the icing capacity? Do you know anything about that?

Mr. MEAD. I do not know about that. But in answer to the Senator's question I am just reminded:

Again referring to the Ellis car of tomatoes, that we may still more fully understand the effect of the Armour exclusive contracts, we have to know that the distance from Gibson, Tenn., to Chicago is 522 miles, and from this point the Armours charged the Messrs. Ellis $73.92 for icing, while the icing charge by the Illinois Central Railroad from New Orleans to Chicago, a distance of 923 miles, is only $30 per car, so that in this instance the Armour exclusive contract enabled the Armour lines to charge $43.92 more for the refrigeration for a distance of 522 miles than the Illinois Central, upon whose lines there are no exclusive contracts, charges for a distance of 923 miles; but if this statement shows an intolerable state of affairs, what shall we think when we are made aware that upon the selfsame day in which the Messrs. Ellis received this car of tomatoes from Gibson, upon which they paid the $73.92 icing charge, they received a like car of tomatoes from Memphis, which is a few miles farther from Chicago than Gibson, and upon this Memphis car the icing cost was only $15, and, to make matters worse, the car used from Memphis, upon which the icing cost was $15, was an Armour car, but hauled over a road where no exclusive Armour contract exists.

Senator CULLOM. One charge was $15 and the other was $73.92.

Mr. MEAD. Yes, sir. One road had an exclusive contract with the Armour Car Lines and the other had not.

Mr. Chairman, wouldn't you like to be the iceman?

Now, gentlemen, if this statement of Mr. Mead's is true, how long are these private car contractors to be permitted to perpetrate their outrages upon the people? I do hope that there is no combination of men in this land of ours so formidable as to cause our leaders to make peace with them. Why, Mr. Chairman, this land of the free and home of the brave belongs to all of the people. There is nothing in the Constitution permitting a few wealthy monopolists to manage it for their own gratification, the fact that the absorbing sentiment of their souls seems to be that the country belongs to them to the contrary notwithstanding.

In his statement before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, United States Senate, Thursday, April 20, 1905, Mr. Lucius Tuttle, president of the Boston and Maine Railroad, of the Maine Central Railroad, of the Washington County Railway, and some others, during the course of his remarks took occasion to impart to the committee the following information in justification of rate discrimination.

In the northern part of Maine there are perhaps hundreds of thousands of acres of spruce lands. Up to within a few years, say within ten years, in certain portions of northern Maine there were no inhabitants. At a certain place there was a primeval forest, not containing even a hundred cabins. A railroad was put into that territory—the Bangor and Aroostook. An opportunity was given to develop the timber industries of that section. Certain capitalists discussed the question of establishing a pulp and paper mill in that region. They selected a place, and called it Millinocket, and found that they could bond a large quantity of timber land, with good available water power, and the conditions for manufacturing paper and pulp were very satisfactory. But before the could do anything more than bond it, it became necessary for them to go to the railroad and find out what it could do for them in the distribution of their product. In order to establish a profitable industry up there they had to manufacture an enormous quantity daily. That involved the problem of distribution of that product, which was largely paper upon which to print newspapers. They could sell a portion to Boston, certain portions to New York, and perhaps some to Philadelphia papers, and all those places could be reached easily in competition with paper and pulp sent from other sections of the country, because the distances were comparatively short. But they found that that would not use up all their product. It was necessary for them to manufacture upon a scale sufficiently large to make the product cheap, so that their production would be very much in excess of that which they could get used in the nearer markets. So they came to the railroad and said: "We want to know what rate you will charge us to carry these products to Boston and New York and Chicago and all about for us, and then we can determine whether we can build that mill."

Then the railroad had to take into account the fact that perhaps in Chicago paper was received from mills not more than 500 miles away, and so it became necessary, in order to meet that competition, to carry that paper from Maine to Chicago, a distance of some 1,400 or 1,500 miles, so that it could be sold to the Chicago newspapers at the same price that they would have to pay for paper that came only 500 miles. The railroad did equalize its rate and gave the company such a rate that they could put their products into the markets of the United States; and in consequence of that has arisen that place of Millinocket in the last ten years, a place which has schools, churches, streets, electric lights, and a population of 3,000 or 4,000, who live as comfortably as they do anywhere in the world—a place where ten years ago it was primeval forest. Those 2,000 or 3,000 people receive practically all their supplies by rail—their food, their clothing—and they travel; they make business where before that it was forest or desert; and the railroads leading into that place get reasonable rates for that travel and get enough out of those people so they can afford to give those mills the low rates to Chicago, and nobody suffers. If the railroad had said, when that subject was first brought up, "No, we can not give those rates," there would have been no such place as Millinocket.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this rate, which transformed a primeval forest in northern Maine into the thriving city of Millinocket in order that the Bangor and Aristook Railroad might increase its business, was, I am constrained to believe, a wise and beneficent one. It not only furnished a way whereby Millinocket pulp manufacturers could compete for the business of the greatest daily newspapers in the world at Chicago, but it had a tendency to further the growth of the railroads over which the citizens of Millinocket must ship and receive their daily supplies. That is business, and a kind of business against which no fair man can justly complain. But why should Mr. Tuttle divert the minds of the committee from the real cause of complaint, and why did the committee permit him so to do? The rate given to the Millinocket concern was not so low as to annihilate similar concerns nearer the point of competition. The rates against which the people are crying out so vociferously are those rates which enable one business concern to thrive while others must languish—a low rate given to one concern as against a high rate given to another concern engaged in the shipment of the same commodities from and to the same points.

Now, Mr. Chairman, whatever excuses the railroads may give to justify themselves they can not deny the facts. Unreasonable rates, rebates, and rate discrimination have been granted and wrongs have been perpetrated, too, in defiance of all constitutional authority and against all laws. The question then arises, What legislation is necessary to correct these evils? That there is a sure and efficient way there can be no intelligent contention. All wrongs can be righted when the lawmaking power makes up its mind to right them, and the concensus of opinion is that the time to act has at last come. Let the action, however, be wise and conservtaive, but none the less effective.

Confiscatory legislation can not be enforced, and an attempt to pass such legislation should be rejected. Let us pass some measure, my friends, which will do complete justice to all concerned—a measure which will do injustice neither to the railroads nor to the shipper nor to any community. No railroad official of any consequence has, to my knowledge, objected to the passage of such legislation, and the people are asking for nothing more and will accept nothing less.

In conversations I have had with many gentlemen upon this all-absorbing question I do not recall a single instance when a wish has been expressed that rates which would be prohibitive upon the prosperity of the railroads might be imposed. On the contrary, the hope has frequently been expressed that reasonableness and fairness might prevail among the representatives of the people whenever they are called upon to enact legislation regulating interstate commerce.

To the railroads we owe in great part not only the prosperity but the happiness of our people. Upon them depends the continued success of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures. Without their beneficent aid we could not to-day hold the first place among the producing nations of the world. They are our greatest benefactors. Let us, then, do justice to the railroads, to the shipper, and to the people. Let us not weaken the charm of the word "honor," upon which is based the stability of our country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I believe, there is no one in this House and no one in the country who desires to do any injury to the railroads. We all know and believe that the prosperity of the whole country depends almost entirely upon our transportation system. There is no one who would take away any right from any road or in any way oppress any railroad corporation. In fact, I have never known of any attempt that was successful in this country to oppress any railroad corporation, and it is very doubtful if there ever will be.

Under the law, as it now exists, the Interstate Commerce Commission has every power, except one, granted by this bill, and that is to fix maximum rates. The only addition is to extend the control of the Commission to terminal facilities, private car lines, and private switch facilities, so that there shall be no special charges on these accounts that will make rates that are unjust or unreasonable or reductions that shall give undue preference to any particular person or favored shipper.

The gentleman from Maine very much feared that one provision of section 13 of the old law might, in some way, in connection with the provisions of the amendment, give the Commission power to initiate a schedule of rates for any or all the railroads of the country at any time that the Commission saw fit.

It seems to me that there is nothing in section 13 and nothing in this bill that can be construed to have any such effect. Section 13 of the present law provides for complaints by shippers and others to the Commission of violations of the interstate-commerce law by any common carrier, and—

That the Commission may institute any inquiry on its own motion in the same manner and to the same effect as though a complaint had been made.

Section 15, as amended by the bill now before the House, empowers and directs the Commission, after a hearing on a complaint, made as provided in section 13, or upon complaint of a common carrier to determine and prescribe "just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged."

Here is a direct grant to the Commission of power to make maximum rates upon a complaint, and how in any way that can be construed in connection with the latter part of section 13 as a power to fix rates upon their own initiative is something that I can not understand. The gentleman from Maine himself is very doubtful if it does give any such power. The grant of power that this bill gives to the Commission is plainly that to fix maximum rates upon a complaint. That is exactly what the Commission has recommended, it is what the committee of this House on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has recommended, it is what the President has recommended, and it is what the House intends to do. And it seems to me that the language of the bill gives the power to the Commission, and no further power than to fix maximum rates upon a complaint made to it.

It is urged that there is no occasion for the grant of any such power, and I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to state that there was no occasion and no demand from the country for the grant of any such power. In the first place, before the Interstate Commerce Commission during the last year there were filed 568 complaints. These include 65 formal cases and investigations, and these involve directly the rates and practices of 321 railroads and common carriers in all parts of the country. After hearing these cases, the Commission were authorized only to find that the rates or practices were unjust, and that was their finding in most of these cases, but they had no power to state what was just or reasonable. And there was no one that had any power to state it except the corporation that made the unjust charge.

Many cases of unjust rates charged by railroads, known to the people of all sections of the country and still persisted in, have never been before the Commission. There is one practice of the Pennsylvania Railroad that obtains every year which is clearly an outrage upon the rights of the people. The coal railroads start every April with a fixed price for coal delivered at tide water, and with the announcement that the rate will be increased 10 cents per month for five months, until the time when the poor must have coal, and then they have to buy coal at the highest rate during all the rest of the year until the next April. There is no justification for any such a practice as that. The coal railroads of Pennsylvania have fixed the freight for carriage of coal to the seaboard at such a rate that the coal has been advanced from a dollar to one dollar and a half in price ever since they made their combination and forced the independent operators to come in with them, and it has remained at that ever since. Before they made their combination and forced the independent operators to sell all their output to the combination, the price of coal delivered to the Atlantic seaboard was only $4 a ton. To-day it runs from $5 to $5.50 a ton, and has been so continuously ever since that combination of the roads in Pennsylvania.

These railroads own to-day 90 per cent of all the coal mines in Pennsylvania, and have control substantially of all the coal that is used in the great cities of the East, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and, to a considerable extent, of this city. In this city coal is to-day a dollar a ton higher than it ought to be, on account of the unlawful combination and unreasonable freight charges of these roads.

There have been two cases just decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission of unreasonable charges, and these are only two of thousands. The rate on cotton goods from New York to San Francisco, they find in these cases, is $1 per hundred pounds in carload lots, and in less than carload lots $1.50 per hundred pounds. To Denver they will make no rate on carload lots, but they charge $2.24 per hundred pounds from New York to Denver, while they carry it in less than carload lots to San Francisco, nearly 2,000 miles farther, for $1.50 per hundred pounds. The rate from New York to the Mississippi River is 64 cents; from the Mississippi River to the Missouri River, 35 cents; and from the Missouri River to Denver, $1.25, making the $2.24. The Commission found that this was unreasonable, and that in their opinion the rate ought not to be over $1.50.

The Commission assumed that the rate from New York to San Francisco must be at least the cost of carrying, and find that a charge of $2.24 for two-thirds the service they are ready to render for $1.50 is unjust. They go further in this case than I have known in any of the cases decided lately, and say that the railroad has no right to carry goods at less than cost and charge the loss to the other parts of the country. That is the very thing the railroad presidents, managers, and traffic managers testified before the Senate committee they had a right to do, that they intended to do, and that they believed was just that they should do.

This practice, it seems to me, is one of the wrongs the railroads have perpetrated upon the country, and which has occasioned the most indignation among the people, namely, that they claim a right to and do transport freight to one community at less than cost and charge the loss in increased rates up to some other community that they do not look favorably upon.

A special demand has been made upon Congress by 418 memorials from forty-four different States by 418 organizations of shippers, fruit growers, and others, who protest against this and other unjust practices of the railroads and ask Congress that the Commission be given power to fix rates, so that they may be treated justly. Sixty-two national and sectional organizations of shippers and producers have petitioned Congress to give the Commission power to fix rates. And lastly, according to the testimony before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce at the last session, there were eight legislatures that had sent memorials to Congress asking it to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix rates.

It would seem that there is no great trouble with the railroads for a lack of profit. According to the testimony before the Senate committee, in the last four years ending June 30, 1903, the railroads of this country, after paying dividends on their stock running from 5 per cent to 23½ per cent in one instance, have laid up a surplus of $358,444,000 and applied on permanent improvements $92,500,000, showing that after having paid dividends that were in some cases exorbitant they had made a surplus of $550,000,000. All this enormous profit was made over and above dividends, rebates, the allowances to private car lines, the enormous allowances, as in the city of New York, for terminal facilities, and the vast private freight lines that eat up the income properly belonging to the railroads.

We can hope for no relief from the railroads themselves. Such competition as did exist between interstate and through lines has almost entirely disappeared. Mr. Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, states that half a dozen men control all the railroads in this country, with a few exceptions, and that those exceptions are entirely in the hands and at the mercy of this combination. This afternoon one gentleman read here part of the combination agreement between the great railroads, which provided that there should be no competition. In the hearings before the House committee at the last session and before the Senate Committee of Interstate Commerce during last spring and summer the railroad traffic managers and presidents admitted that there was no longer any competition in this country except where water transportation was possible.

The objection to a proper regulation and control of railroad rates arises from the misunderstanding of the real status of a railroad company or railway. A railway is not at all a piece of private property like a house or a horse or a farm. A railroad is a public highway, and it does not belong to the railroad company in the same proprietary sense that a house or a farm belongs to its owner.

It is a public road and franchise that belongs to the public, and it is loaned or put into the hands of a corporation for the benefit and use of the public and not for the purpose of enriching beyond the dreams of man any particular person. Members here from the East do not realize that so much as people in the West. During the years I lived in the West I saw in the immediate neighborhood where I lived a great railroad corporation with enormous assets secure a franchise from the people, a free franchise, a free gift, then send its shrewd agents throughout the country, and by working on the feelings of the farmers and those who desired to secure transportation for offers of assistance toward the construction of the proposed road, until they secured from the hard-working farmers a vote of bonds sufficient in amount to build the railroad. So the railroad company received first a franchise as a free gift, then they received a railroad fully built as a free gift, and in some instances they received also a free gift of the rolling stock and equipments.

Such cases show precisely what a railroad is. It is nothing more than a public highway. It is put in the hands of a corporation to control and conduct, not for the benefit of the stockholder, not for the benefit of the officers, but for the benefit and convenience of the public; and the officers of that corporation have no more business to treat that railroad as a private enterprise from which they have a right to gain as much profit for themselves and stockholders as possible than has a public official to so conduct his office as to gain for himself and his friends great emoluments and rewards. Yet the whole system of the fixing of rates by the railroads has been upon the basis of securing for its officers and stockholders from the people every cent that they can possibly obtain and still allow the people to do business. That is what the railroad officials themselves say. That is what they all testify before the Commission and at all times, that their basis of rate fixing is "all the traffic will bear."

You can see this exemplified in the late case just decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission before referred to, where the railroads charged between New York and San Francisco only $1.50 per hundredweight because there is water transportation, and the railroads would only get a small share of the business unless they came down to a reasonable rate. But when it came to the case of Denver, where the railroad combination has sway and there is no competition, then they charged $2.24 a hundred, although Denver is only about two-thirds of the way across the continent.

There is not a place in this country that is in the hands of the railroads, where there is no water transportation, that the same thing does not occur, unless some official of the railroad is interested in that particular place. In Iowa they have adopted a mileage rate, and the result is, they say, that the whole country is prosperous; that the towns all over the State are growing enormously; that manufactories instead of being brought together in some few towns that the railroads are interested in, are springing up all over the State, and it leads to the prosperity of the whole country, and prevents the enormous growth of cities, which is really one of the greatest dangers that this country now faces. It probably would not do to fix rates for interstate commerce on a purely mileage basis, but certainly rates should be in some reasonable proportion to services rendered, instead as now—solely upon the question of how much can be extorted from the shipper.

There is every reason why we should pass this bill. There is no one that objects to it except the railroad corporations and their owners, who are taking from this country a much larger per cent of profit than they are entitled to, and who not only take from the country a larger per cent than they are entitled to, but give cheap rates to favored localities and make up the loss by taking extortionate rates from others. There is no way to remedy this injustice unless we put in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission power to say what shall be the just and impartial rate for all.

It seems to me it is a most remarkable proposition—certainly to the people of the West, where the roads have been given free—that they should give the right to the corporation to build the road, furnish them the money to build and equip it, and then have the road say to them that they have no right whatever to say what charge they shall pay upon their own highway.

It is to me a most remarkable circumstance that any considerable number of people who are not interested in securing the largest possible pay for the railroads, who are not the owners of the railroads, should for one moment be deceived by any talk of socialism or anarchy.

Gentlemen, the only way we can prevent socialism and anarchy is by controlling the great corporations in this country. The one thing that creates the greatest discontent in this country is that we have allowed such enormous corporations to grow up and be substantially without any control at all. I am not in favor of socialism or of anarchy, for that matter, any more than the gentleman from Maine or the gentleman from Pennsylvania or anyone else in this country. I do not fear the result to the railroads or to the country if we pass this bill, no matter who shall be President. No commission will ever be appointed, no commission can exist in this country, that will oppress the railroads so that the prosperity of this country will be affected disastrously. There will never be a time so long as this country exists when the railroads will not get all they ought to, and in many instances a great deal more.

The evil of uncontrolled conditions of traffic in this country is felt by all the people. The people are in favor of its control; they want somebody in this country that will have a right to say how much they shall pay besides the man who is going to get the money. All the people in this country see the right and justice in a case of that kind, where we have granted to the great railroad corporations a substantial monopoly, and where they have come into a combination so that there is no longer any real competition. It has now become necessary that some disinterested tribunal should be in power to decide what is a just rate to charge the people of the country for carrying their products upon these, their own great highways. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I would not undertake at this stage of the consideration of this measure to go into any extended discussion of the legal questions involved, or the expediency of the policy which is presented by the bill now pending before the House. Really, so far as I have been able to investigate, and I have devoted considerable time to the subject, the decisions of the courts of last resort, both of the State and of the United States, have upheld the power of the States to regulate railroad rates within the States, and the power of the United States to regulate railroad rates in interstate commerce by a commission created for that purpose. The Constitution confers the power upon Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and the courts have held by an unbroken line of authority that Congress can by legislative authority exercise that power through a commission. Only 25 per cent of the commerce is within the States and 75 per cent is interstate, and hence the importance of the Government exercising effectively this constitutional power conferred for the protection of the people.

Upon the first day of this session of Congress I introduced a bill to confer upon the Commission power to regulate rates, which was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I congratulate myself that in the report the distinguished chairman of that great committee made to this House in reference to this bill he mentioned the fact that that bill was introduced by me, with quite a number of others, and states that from all the bills so introduced some of the provisions of this bill were obtained. It is a source of congratulation, not only to this House, but to the country, that this bill received the unanimous approval of all the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, both Democrats and Republicans, and that it is a source of additional gratification that it has met with such universal approval on the floor of this House. So far, of all the many speakers who have addressed themselves to the question, there are only three gentlemen—the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL]—who have opposed this bill and urged that it ought not to become the law of the land.

These gentlemen are ingenious and resourceful, and they present what to their minds, I presume, are satisfactory reasons to govern their action in opposition to this important measure. But the fact, Mr. Chairman, that this bill receives the unanimous indorsement of all the members of this great committee and that it has met such universal approval on the floor of this House on the part of the representatives of the people is evidence of the fact that behind it is a great demand on the part of the people of this country who are vitally interested in this great subject.

From time to time different manufacturing, financial, commercial, and industrial interests have applied to this House for relief from evils of which they complained. They all received attention and have had legislation adopted here which brought about at least some of the relief sought by these various interests. The great producers of this country now come before this body asking this legislation. It is in their interest and for their welfare; and because of the fact that they are prone to bear their burdens without complaint is a strong indorsement to us that this legislation, coming in obedience to their universal demand, is righteous and just.

This bill, it seems to me, is conservative from every point of view. All interests have been considered and justice under its provisions meted out to all. Taking into consideration the great interests that are involved, the thirteen or fourteen billions of dollars that are to-day invested in the 217,000 miles of railroad in the country, the fact that something like 2,000,000 people are interested as owners or as employees of these great corporations, and further taking into consideration the great interests of the 80,000,000 American people which are vitally involved in the issues presented by this bill, looking at it from every standpoint, it is a conservative measure and one that should commend itself not only to the Members upon this floor, but to the country at large. [Applause.] It is comprehensive in its scope. In the first section of this proposed act it provides that—

The provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad (or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment) from one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States, and also to the transportation in like manner of property shipped from any place in the United States to a foreign country and carried from such place to a port of transshipment, or shipped from a foreign country to any place in the United States and carried to such place from a port of entry either in the United States or an adjacent foreign country: Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the transportation of passengers or property, or to the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of property wholly within one State and not shipped to or from a foreign country from or to any State or Territory aforesaid.

Thus including in its provisions all kinds of carriers in interstate commerce and in the proviso reserving to the States the control of passenger and freight traffic within the States. Not only does it provide for the control of these different characters of carriers in this country, but it gives a specific definition of what shall be included in the term "railroad" as used in the act, and provides as follows:

The term "railroad," as used in this act, shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease, and shall also include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of the persons or property designated herein, and also all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary in the transportation or delivery of any of said property.

Then it defines in specific terms the meaning of the word "transportation," as follows:

The term "transportation" shall include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported; and it shall be the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of this act to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and to establish through routes and just and reasonable rates applicable thereto.

And then declares that—

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

Now, with the definition clear and distinct as to what carriers are included in the provisions of this act and what shall be meant by the term "railroad" and by the term "transportation," and that all rates shall be reasonable, in my judgment, the provisions of this act can not be construed away, and that is important, because the courts have held that the Interstate Commerce Commission can only exercise the powers specifically conferred in the act and that nothing shall be done by implication. Hence, the importance of these provisions.

There is one provision in the bill which I introduced which I fear is not in this bill. It is possible that it is covered by the provision in this act where the Interstate Commerce Commission is given power to govern all "regulations and practices" of the railroads. The provision in the bill I introduced provided specifically that they should have the power to revise classifications as well as rates. I hope the provisions of this bill cover that, because it is an important feature, in my judgment, to be considered. Another provision in my bill, Mr. Chairman, which I would be glad to have in this bill, was a provision which required that the railroads, whether they proposed to carry the shipment the entire distance or whether they proposed to transmit it through another carrier to the final destination, should be required to give a through bill of lading, and in that bill of lading specify exactly what the rate should be, and that then they should not be permitted to deviate from that rate.

That provision may also be covered in this bill by the general power conferred to revise rates, and I hope it is; but I would be glad if it was specifically included, and then there could be no doubt about it, for I consider it very important. This bill also confers the power to substitute and put into effect a reasonable rate in place of an unreasonable and therefore unlawful rate. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, the question presented to us is whether or not these rates shall be revised by a Commission to be appointed by the President, and who will act under oath, or whether or not the rates shall be fixed by people who are not responsible to any governmental control or to any appointive power, and not even to the people themselves.

In this country there is no longer any real competition, for three traffic associations fix all the rates. One north of the Ohio and the Potomac rivers fixes rates for that section of the country; one on the Pacific slope and another south of the Ohio and the Potomac rivers fix the rates for those sections, and each of these rate-making boards are composed of four men. Hence the railroad rates of this country are fixed by twelve men. The question is whether they shall continue to fix absolutely the railroad rates of the country or whether the rates shall be revised and made reasonable by officers of the Government under oath, who are disinterested and who will give just and honest consideration to both sides of the question when presented, and do equal-handed justice to all parties. The issue is up to us as the representatives of the American people, and it is an issue between the corporations of the country and the people of the country.

The question is whether the country and the people shall be dominated by the great corporate influences or whether they shall have relief through the law administered by the officers of the law under oath. The issue is sharp and well defined, and the people are aroused and waiting with interest the result of our acts, and they will hold him responsible who may flinch or show the "white feather" in this crucial hour. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped I might have opportunity to discuss this bill and this great question fully, but on account of very serious illness in my family during its pendency before this House, I have not been able to get together the data I had collected so as to properly present it to the House, or to cogently collect my thoughts.

But I desired to say this much in order that I might express my intention to vote for the bill which is now pending before the House, as I believe it is a very great improvement upon the legislation which now stands upon the statute books, and if enacted into law, as I hope it will be, that it will bring some measure of relief to the people. From their honest hearts they believe they have a just cause of complaint, and are demanding that they be given some legislation to vitalize the powers and the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission and give to them a tribunal where they can go and, at least, present their causes, and where wrongs have been done have them righted. This bill will do that, and I hope to see it become a law. I thank you, my friends, for your very kind attention. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak during the general debate on the pending measure, because I did not expect to get the time. However, by the courtesy of my friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], and quite unexpectedly, and I might say quite unpreparedly, I am afforded at this inopportune time the privilege of having my say on this all-important subject—a matter of much moment to all the people of the land, and affecting more or less intimately every section of our country—the question of the fixing of railway rates and the regulation of railroad and other transportation companies doing an interstate-commerce business in the United States.

I thank my friend from Georgia for his kindness in yielding to me his time, and I grasp the opportunity to use some of it, because I realize that if I did not take advantage of it now, I might not get a chance to speak to-morrow, when the debate on the bill will close; and I know by sad experience in this House that when the bill is to be read and is open for amendment, the day after to-morrow, there will be little or no debate permitted by those having this measure in charge. The bill, I am informed, is going to be rushed through the House—railroaded, as it were—regardless of its defects and its omissions and its incompleteness, and all amendments that Members desire to offer to strengthen the measure are to be quickly voted down, and the bill just as it came from the committee passed on to the tender mercies of the sacrific Senate.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, this matter of just and reasonable railroad rates and the governmental regulation of transportation companies doing an interstate-commerce business is one of the most important questions now before the American people. It is a live question, and no matter what we do now, or say now, you know and I know that it is here to stay until it is settled and settled right; and the problem never will be solved, and the issue will never down, until it is solved and settled for the best interest of all the people, and not in the interest of the selfish few.

I have given much careful study to this great subject. I know something about it. As a legislator trying my best to do my duty as I see it to all the people, I have given, and will continue to give, my very best efforts to help in the solution of the many problems we are called upon in these matters to determine, and they should be solved and determined by us in a spirit of fairness and equality and equity to all concerned. The highways of commerce, the avenues of industry, the byways of trade must be open to all; and every shipper and every producer must be treated exactly alike—no midnight tariffs, no rebates, no discriminations, and no favoritism. Equal rights to all and special privileges to none must be our watchword. [Applause.]

Now, sir, we all realize, I believe, that the great interstate-transportation agencies of our country are here to stay. They are essential to the business of the country. They can not be dispensed with nor destroyed. They are as fixed in our commercial life as the hours of the day, and as immutable in our industrial existence as the medium of exchange. Their mileage, and their equipment, and their wealth, and their power, and their influence will not diminish, but will increase more and more as the years come and go. They will continue to dominate the people if the people do not take action to control and to regulate them. The people of the country are aroused on this question. They will keep up the fight until it is won. You can beat the people to-day, you can deceive the people to-morrow, but the contest between right and wrong will go on, and sooner or later the people will win. I am with the people in this fight. It is either Government regulation now, or Government ownership hereafter—take your choice. [Applause.] As the President said on this subject in his message to the Congress in December, 1904, the Government must in increasing degree supervise and regulate the workings of the railways engaged in interstate commerce, and such increased supervision is the only alternative to an increase of the present evils on the one hand or a still more radical policy on the other.

I read not long ago, Mr. Chairman, that more than 80 per cent of the enormous railroad mileage which to-day gridirons the United States has been constructed since the civil war. We have over 215,000 miles of main railroad tracks, and the giant spider is still spreading its web of steel in every and all directions. And when we take into consideration the second, third, and fourth tracks, and sidings and terminals, the total foots up to nearly 300,000 miles of steel railroad tracks. Just think of that! Sufficient to go twelve times around the earth, or make a journey to the moon, if such a thing were possible, and have miles and miles to spare. We are indeed the greatest railroad country on earth, and will continue to be for a century to come. And if we pause to consider these marvelous figures and facts we must be impressed with the consciousness of the far-reaching power and effect of the railway influence in every line of human industry, and if we stop to analyze the volume of traffic handled we can not fail to realize how greatly the railway systems of our country enter into every phase of modern life.

In 1894 the railroads carried 638,000,000 tons of freight. In 1904 the figures more than doubled and reached the enormous total of 1,309,000,000 tons, with aggregate traffic earnings amounting to the enormous total of $1,977,638,713. Last year they did a largely increased business, and the figures for 1906 will greatly exceed those of last year. In 1895 the records show that 527,421,000 passengers were carried; in 1904 the figures increased to 715,419,000, and when the reports for last year are at hand a much larger increase will be evident. The figures are bewildering and the facts as startling as they are astonishing; and the end is not yet.

To transport this vast number of passengers and gigantic amount of freight, including all varieties of foodstuffs, there were utilized 47,000 engines, 40,000 passenger cars, and 1,760,000 freight cars. In the operation of this great network of railways more than 1,250,000 men are directly employed, of which 52,000 are engine drivers, 55,000 firemen, 40,000 conductors, and 106,000 trainmen.

Of course, I know figures are usually uninteresting; but these figures are alive with human interest and full of flesh and blood activity, because they have to do not only with men and measures, but also with our national commercial life and our fundamental political and industrial institutions, which should safeguard the interests of all the people—but more often do not—and the home life, and the very existence of every man who works for a livelihood and earns his bread in the sweat of his face. [Applause.]

The rapid growth of our interstate common-carrier systems during the past quarter of a century has been simply marvelous, and the tremendous power they wield to-day in the intimate political and social and economic life of the country is truly inconceivable. The average man who rides on a railroad train in comfort and in luxury to a distant point has little conception of how the railway affects even the most intimate details of his existence. It is the power that dictates political conventions and makes nominations; that seats its well-paid lawyers in the courts of justice; that rules legislatures; that subsidizes the press; that dominates the National Congress, and that compels all of us, who must eat to maintain life, to pay the price for food which the big transportation interests fix directly or indirectly.

From a systematic investigation of existing conditions and a careful examination of governmental statistics, I fearlessly assert that the time is now at hand when the Government must take decisive action to regulate the great railways and great public transportation utilities of the country doing an interstate-commerce business, or they will ere long absolutely own and control the Government, and, through their great tentacles stretching out in every direction, they will be able to strangle competition, crush commercial endeavor, paralyze individual industrialism, and create the trust of all trusts and the monopoly of all monopolies.

These giant public utility transportation companies, traversing as they do every part of our national domain, are so vital a part of our complex industrial and economical and political life that their influence affects all things which go to make up our existence from day to day. I believe the people are just awakening to the consciousness of the real facts and the true situation, and in the study of the problem of the cost of living are finding out for themselves what recent economic writers have shown conclusively, and that is how the control and the power and the operation of railroads in this country overshadow every other factor of human existence.

And so, sir, knowing what I do about the facts and the conditions, and feeling as I do on this subject, I welcome remedial legislation, and shall favor any bill that will correct the abuses and remedy the evils incident to the subject-matter now under consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have carefully listened to the several clever speeches which have been delivered during the consideration of this measure. These brilliant forensic efforts, however, have failed, to my mind, to greatly illumine the subject or to impart to us very much valuable information. The time consumed in this debate, nevertheless, may not have been altogether wasted. Far from it; but it does seem to me strange that no two Members who have discussed the bill agree as to just what it means and as to just what it will do. In justice to myself I want to say that I do not agree with all that has been said in favor of the pending bill, and neither do I concur in all that has been said against the bill. We all appear to agree that the measure under consideration is not a perfect bill, intended to remedy every evil incident to the subject-matter. I do not think that even its distinguished author, for whose abilities in these matters I have great admiration, will seriously assert such a claim. Take this bill all in all, and the best that can be claimed for it, in my judgment, is that it is only a feeble effort to correct, in a doubtful way and to a limited degree, long-standing and patent and glaring abuses. Will the bill in its present shape even do this? I indulge the hope that it will to some extent, and if it does it will accomplish something; and believing that it will do some good, that it will remedy some evils, that it will correct some abuses, I shall vote for the bill; because with all its faults, with all its doubts, with all its omissions, with all its defects, I sincerely hope, and I want to honestly believe, that it is a step in the right direction—a legislative advance—a Congressional stride forward along right lines for the benefit of the many against the selfish interests of the few. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said, there are some things about this bill that I do not like, and that I would change if I could have my way. I trust I will be forgiven by the sponsors of the bill if I indulge in a few criticisms of the measure, and, by way of suggestion, point out some glaring defects that should be cured by amendment to make the legislation more effective. The bill is a long one, but not a very comprehensive measure. It is an amendment to the interstate-commerce act, and purports to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The committee reporting the bill generously admit that in its preparation they were aided by the study of all the bills introduced by Members on this subject, and I want to say that I introduced at the beginning of this session what I believe to be a bill in the right direction, a bill that I seriously believe if enacted into law would, to a very great extent, effectually put a stop to railroad rebates and transportation discriminations. It is a short bill and a simple bill and a comprehensive bill. I do not know what consideration it received from the committee reporting the bill before us, but I do know that if it were a part of the law not a transportation company in the land would dare violate its provisions, because if it did the doors of a felon's jail would open to receive the officials of the company granting the rebate or discrimination, as well as the shipper receiving the gratuity and the favoritism. I have no vanity in the matter. I am seeking results for the best interests of all the people.

I do not claim perfection for my bill, like some of the zealous advocates of the pending bill claim for the measure now before us; but I do claim that my bill, to say the least, will go very far toward the serious solution of the many problems confronting us, and, in my opinion, have a beneficial tendency to correct present interstate transportation abuses. I believe that one of the greatest evils complained about in all these matters is the rebate abuse, by which an unjust discrimination is made between shippers and a rebate given back to one shipper, or to several shippers, which all the others must contribute to by paying an exorbitant rate.

This bill, sir, which I introduced (H. R. 8414) to amend the interstate-commerce act, and which is referred to in the report of the committee, would, in my opinion, effectually put a stop to rebates by making the rebate, if one is given, the maximum rate—that is to say, the rate paid minus the rebate would stand as the highest rate. If this bill were a law I am satisfied that no railroad or other transportation company could give a rebate without the fact being quickly found out by some shipper who was discriminated against, and just as soon as the fact of the rebate was established the Commission would fix the rate charged minus the rebate as the maximum rate. I believe if some provision of that kind were put in the bill now under consideration with a criminal penalty clause for its violation, it would effectually do away with rebates; but I would go further in this matter and make it a felony for any official connected with a railroad company, or other transportation system, doing an interstate commerce business, to grant a rebate, or for any shipper over the line to receive a rebate. If this were the law I am satisfied there would be no more rebates and that the evil would cease for all time to come. [Applause.]

We should make the punishment fit the crime, and if we do I believe there will be no more railroad rebates. Put in the bill a provision making the giving or the receiving of a rebate a criminal offense, punishable by a long term of imprisonment, and I say to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and to the Members of this House, and I say to the country, that there would not be a railroad or interstate transportation company that would give a rebate, and no shipper would dare receive a rebate for love or money. [Applause.] You will never stop this iniquitous system of rebate favoritism and discrimination until you point to the prison doors. If this bill were intended to carry out the recommendations of the President it would contain a provision of this kind and the problem, so far as secret rebates are concerned, would be solved, and you never again would hear a shipper complain about a railroad or any other great public-utility transportation company doing an interstate-commerce business giving a secret rebate. [Applause.]

But here we have the unanimous report, the concentrated wisdom, of all the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and after laboring industriously for a year [laughter] they bring forth this remarkable document [laughter], this bill of twenty-six long pages of uncertain phrases, that a Philadelphia lawyer can not comprehend [laughter], and which, I undertake to say, if placed on the statute books in its present shape and ultimately held to be constitutional, will not accomplish the purpose desired by the people of the country who have been complaining for the last quarter of a century against these unjust and unreasonable rates, these railroad favoritisms, and these interstate transportation discriminations. [Applause.]

I can demonstrate it, I think, in a very few words. If the gentlemen interested will glance at page 11 of this bill, section 15, they will find there what may aptly be termed the weak link in the chain of this measure. [Laughter.] On page 11, line 5, section 15, the bill prescribes the procedure of the Commission to fix and establish "a fair and just and reasonable rate." Then follows this significant language:

"That such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier, and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier unless"—mark the language. Here is what I believe to be the little joker in this bill [laughter]—"unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission, or suspended or modified or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction." Here is the committee's little black man. [Laughter.] This is the African in the railroad wood pile. [Laughter.] Can these words be misunderstood? I think not. I believe the railroads of the land and their lawyers are aware of their significance. I believe they know the import of this section, and I want to submit in all candor [laughter] to the railroad lawyers of the country how they interpret these words in the last line, to wit: "Or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction?" They know now what these words mean. I think I know what they mean, but the people who want railroad-rate legislation will find out later what they mean. [Laughter and applause.]

The word "suspended," if I am not mistaken, is used in this section of the bill advisedly, and it was put in there to baffle the efforts of those most anxious to accomplish something for the relief of the shippers of the country from unjust railroad rates and discriminations. I am aware that the word "suspended" has a well-known definition. [Laughter.] I am inclined to believe, however, that some of us just now fail to grasp the real significance of the word [laughter]; but if this bill becomes a law in its present shape those now crying at the doors of Congress for relief against railroad extortion will soon find out the fatality and the significance of the word "suspended." [Laughter.] Then some of us will be "suspended" by our trusting constituents. [Laughter.] The whole object sought by this remedial legislation may "hang" on this ominous word "suspended." [Laughter and applause.] And when the poor and injured shipper complains to the Interstate Commerce Commission created by this bill, consisting of seven members hereafter to be appointed for a term of seven years, at an annual salary of $10,000—and I can imagine the struggle of the railroads to get just the right kind of men on this new commission—when the shipper makes his complaint, and the Commission fixes the rate—that is to say, makes its order establishing a fair and just and reasonable rate—I can see in my mind's eye the temporary joy of the shipper, until the railroad lawyer rushes into court and during the thirty days allowed gets an injunction "suspending" the order of the Commission, and then what is the poor shipper to do? Why, go on paying the old railroad rate just the same as before. That is the way it will be done. [Applause.]

Let us, for the sake of argument, assume a case and follow it to its logical end. This bill in its present shape becomes a law. The new Commission, we will assume, has been appointed and a shipper who has been discriminated against for years, or who has been injured by rebates, who has been getting poorer and poorer while some other favored shipper, who has been profiting by his misfortunes, is getting richer and richer, makes complaint before the Commission and establishes that the rate he is paying is unjust. The Commission, on all the testimony adduced, is satisfied his complaint is justified and thereupon makes an order fixing a just and reasonable rate. That order will not go into effect for thirty days, and before it can go into effect—that is, during the thirty days, if the order is not satisfactory to the railroad company—the railroad lawyer will go into a court of "competent jurisdiction" and get an injunction "suspending" the order. Then the shipper will have to pay the old extortionate rate, and if he wants to fight the matter he must hire an experienced lawyer to carry the case up on appeal, and before the court of last resort adjudicates the matter between the railroad company and the shipper to see whether an injustice has been done or not, the shipper's business will be "suspended" [laughter] or in the hands of a receiver, and unless the shipper is a well-to-do and a shrewd and a sagacious and a pertinacious business man he will be "suspended" ere the final judgment of the case in the United States Supreme Court. [Great laughter and applause.]

With all due respect to the erudite authors and distinguished sponsors of the pending bill, I am inclined to think that this provision can be materially changed for the better by an amendment I shall suggest. If the bill becomes a law in its present shape, I am afraid it will accomplish very little of lasting benefit to the shippers and producers of the country, and will have a tendency to cause endless delay, and interminable litigation, and perhaps be the means of defeating the very object desired and sought to be accomplished. I am in earnest about this matter. I want to be fair. I do not want to create discord. I have no desire to find fault. I shall not be captious in my criticism of the pending bill. I am in favor of it, but I want to make it effectual—I want to make it really reach the evils involved and permanently cure them in the speediest possible way. [Applause.]

I am with the people in this railroad fight for justice. I have great personal regard for the distinguished chairman of the committee reporting this bill, but I would be false to myself and to this great cause if I did not honestly say that I believe that he and all the members of the committee could have presented to this House, under all the circumstances, a very much better bill, and I trust I will be pardoned if I am impelled by my sense of duty, and my conception of the gravity of the situation, and the importance of the subject-matter, to point out in the kindliest way some of the serious defects, some of the glaring errors, and what I consider after all the vital weakness of the pending measure. [Applause.]

Hence, Mr. Chairman, I regret to say that I can not and I do not altogether agree with some of my colleagues who are congratulating themselves, and the committee, on the unanimity of the report in favor of this measure, and that the bill in its present shape is going to pass the House by a practically unanimous vote. It is true that the bill comes before the House with a most harmonious report; but a unanimous report from a committee on an important piece of legislation like this against great centralized corporate interests is not an evidence to my mind that the bill is a perfect measure and a complete remedy for existing evils. As an old and experienced legislator, having served for some time in two capitals, it is my opinion that in a great many instances where the report of a committee is unanimous in favor of a bill, especially a bill of such great magnitude as the one under consideration, which affects so many intrenched and powerful interests and which has met with so much opposition heretofore from the very interests affected—I say that the unanimity is susceptible to the construction that the bill is so drawn that somebody is going to be fooled. I do not know whether it will be those who want this legislation or those who do not want it, but I am inclined to think, that if this bill becomes a law in its present shape, that those who want it will be, to say the least, disappointed.

I believe that if the great interstate transportation companies were opposed to this bill their power and their influence would be so far-reaching that there would be a great deal more opposition to the bill than at present is evident. It is a fair assumption to believe that if the railroads of this country were opposed to this bill the measure would not meet with a practically unanimous vote in the House of Representatives. I do not want to go into details. It is unnecessary for me to elaborate the proposition. I have no desire to be a carping critic. Far be it from me to disturb the placid waters existing at present in this body. Of course I assume that the great transportation companies of the country have felt for some time that the demands of the people for the enforcement of the laws, for the abolition of rebates, and for more just and reasonable railway rates would have to be acceded to sooner or later, and perhaps they are willing to accept this weak and doubtful measure rather than run the risk of further arousing public indignation and the enactment of more drastic legislation to curb the power of these great interstate transportation companies.

Everyone familiar with the subject is aware of the fact that for years there have been secret rebates and unlawful discriminations by railroad companies and other transportation corporations to favored shippers. These discriminations and these favoritisms are criminal and must be stopped, and if the laws on the statute book now are not strong enough to put a stop to them, then we must make new laws rigid enough to put an end to them in this country forever. Whether this bill will stop them or not I do not now undertake to say, but I do hope that the bill will be materially amended ere it becomes a law, with the object of more effectually stopping them. I know of no greater injustice to the producers of our country than to have a transportation company give a rebate to one shipper at the expense of all the others. There should be no favoritism; the rate should be the same for all shippers and for all producers; equal rates, equal rights, and equal opportunities for all should be the rule. But we know the history of the past, and we do know of many cases where one shipper has been favored at the expense of all the other shippers until the favored shipper controlled the product or the industry, drove out of business every competitor, and ultimately secured a complete monopoly.

If you will read the testimony which has been adduced in several investigations heretofore held at the instance of the Government you will readily comprehend the truth of this proposition. But I do not care at this time to go into details or to be too critical. I am an optimist and not a pessimist; I hope for the best; and I trust the bill will be materially amended and become a law and accomplish some good. I shall do my best to improve the bill by amendments, if they will be permitted; but I can not refrain now from telling what I actually believe and to voice my convictions and say that the bill in its present shape is not satisfactory to the real friends of Federal regulation. It is a good deal of a makeshift; it is weak; it is apologetic, and the railroads are not opposing it. That puts me on inquiry. The unanimity with which it is going through this House also lends color to the suspicion that the railway interests of the country see no danger in its wishy-washy provisions.

It looks to me as if the fight for a square deal from the railroads is far from won, and the friends of rate reform and governmental regulation of interstate transportation companies must keep up the fight and fight harder than ever. [Applause.]

It is apparent to me that if this bill were intended to compel the railroads to live up to the law now on the statute books, if it were a bill to force the transportation companies to give fair and just and reasonable rates to every producer and to every shipper, you would find these halls filled with railroad lawyers and transportation lobbyists protesting against the passage of the bill; and I am frank to say that the bill would not meet with so very little opposition. But I have not heard of a railroad protesting against the passage of this bill. I have yet to learn of a transportation company sending to the House objections to the enactment of this legislation; and I have not seen nor heard of a single railroad lawyer who has been sent here to argue against the progress of the bill; and so, as I say, I am inclined to be doubtful as to the effectiveness of the remedy proposed in the pending measure. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would the gentleman from New York know a lobbyist when he saw one?

Mr. SULZER. Well, that depends. There are lobbyists and lobbyists, and I do not pretend to be very familiar with either class; but I think I do know a few railroad lawyers when I see them. [Laughter.] I have been a practitioner of the law in an humble way for a number of years, but I have never been retained by any of the great interstate-commerce railroads and corporations. I have been retained, however, now and then by a few honest and sensible clients [laughter] to institute suits against railroads and other interstate-commerce corporations, and my clients will inform those desirous of knowledge concerning the matter that I have generally succeeded in securing for them a speedy trial, justice, and a square deal. As a legislator my sympathies have always been with the under dog, with the poor and the oppressed, with the toiler and the bread winner; and whenever an injustice was committed by some powerful corporation against the weak and the helpless I have been on the latter's side; and as a lawyer my field of professional endeavor has been along the lines of helping the poor and the humble and the distressed; and I suppose I am so constituted that I will continue to do so all the rest of my life, to the loss no doubt of my bank account, but with the approval of my conscience. [Applause.]

I could have been a railroad lawyer had I desired to enter that field of human activity; in fact, I have received one or two offers in my time to devote my energies to that branch of the law. I recollect a very flattering offer made to me a few years ago of $25,000 a year; but I never was very anxious to make money, with me money is a secondary consideration; and I have preferred to pursue the even tenor of the simple life, to work out my professional salvation in my own way and my political career along my own lines. [Laughter.] I work pretty hard here in the Halls of Congress, day in and day out, week in and week out, trying to do the right thing for my constituents and the square thing for the good of the people generally throughout the country. I am content with my work; I rather like it. I would not exchange places with any of the opulent members of "the system." I have cast my lot along the pleasant sunshiny highways of humanity; but sometimes it seems to me that almost every man in the land who has a grievance, or thinks he has a grievance, comes to me to set things right and to secure him justice. I spend a great deal of valuable time investigating some of these complaints, and it takes much labor to do so conscientiously; but whenever I find a case that is really and truly a worthy cause I do not fear or hesitate to take up the burden of the fight and do the best I can. This may be altruistic, and I know that often my efforts are unappreciated, derided, misconstrued, and futile, but I suppose, nevertheless, that I will go on doing so to the end of my time. [Applause.]

I know that the world, that the great big world,
From the pauper up to the king,
Has a different tale from the tale I tell,
And a different song to sing;
But for me, I care not a single fig
If they say I'm wrong or I'm right,
For I'll always go in, if I go in at all,
For the under dog in the fight.

[Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to give credit in this debate to whom credit is due. I want to say that I have been an interested listener to several of the excellent and eloquent speeches which have been delivered for and against this measure, not only an attentive and interested listener, but I have been edified, instructed, and highly entertained. I listened with great interest, as I always do, to my genial friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY]. He ridiculed the bill and arraigned its effectiveness, and I was much amused by the serious earnestness of his incisive and epigrammatic and eloquent remarks. The gentleman nearly convinced me that I ought to vote against the bill of my distinguished and erudite friend from the classic fields of Iowa. [Laughter.] I was greatly interested and listened with rapture to the studied periods of my always eloquent and distinguished friend, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]. He seemed to prove to his own satisfaction the inability of the people to govern themselves. [Laughter.] His argument was an indictment of free institutions—an arraignment of the power of public opinion. [Applause.] I can not follow the gentleman from Maine. I believe in the people. I trust the people. I know the people are capable of self-government. [Applause.] I was much impressed with the beautiful diction and the eloquent words of the scholarly gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], who has given a great deal of study and consideration to every phase of this whole subject; and if I did not know a little about it myself, I think I would be inclined to take his pessimistic view of the results that will follow if this bill should become a law in its present shape. [Laughter.] With these three eminent statesmen against the bill, I began to ponder whether I could conscientiously give it my vote and my support. [Laughter.] I always try to be right, but I know I am not infallible, and I concluded to wait—to hold my peace—to content my soul in patience—until I could listen to the wisdom and the dulcet voice of my dear old friend and philosopher the learned and experienced gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]; and lo! he began to speak; and to my amazement I heard him call the bill a fake—just think of it—a fake! [Laughter.] Is it any wonder we are bewildered? [Laughter.]

But, then, it is only fair for me to say that although I do not often agree with the gentleman from Ohio regarding the merits of proposed legislation, I do, in this instance, however, agree substantially with him regarding the significance of the omission in this bill of express cars and palace cars and sleeping cars. I do not know of any good reason why these railway cars should be carefully omitted from the grasp of the provisions of this bill, but perhaps we shall be enlightened about this later on by some of the speakers for the bill. [Laughter.] I think these palace and sleeping and express cars should be amenable to the plan and the scope and the possibilities of this bill, and I would amend the bill to bring them within its provisions, together with all the other private cars and car lines of the country. The private-car line system is one of the most iniquitous frauds in the transportation business and should be wiped out. I am with the gentleman from Ohio on these propositions. I shall be glad to vote with him to put all these cars under the provisions of this bill. I commend the gentleman from Ohio, and I assure him I shall vote for his proposed amendment——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not state that I would offer any such amendment as that.

Mr. SULZER. I thought that is what the gentleman wanted to do. If I remember correctly, the gentleman was complaining because he could not——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I pointed out the care that had been taken in the drafting of the bill. But my amendment is a matter of very much more importance, in my judgment. That is the one relating to the commingling of the corporation that produces the goods that are shipped on the railroad and the corporation that handles the railroad.

Mr. SULZER. Very good; I am with the gentleman on that proposition, too. [Laughter.] But I understood the gentleman from Ohio to complain about the omission from the provisions of this bill of palace, sleeping, and express cars, and I concur with the gentleman and justify his complaint, and think it is a mistake that these cars, doing an interstate-commerce business, should be omitted from the provisions of the measure we have before us. They should be included in this bill, and the gentleman from Ohio was quite right in what he said in this connection. But he went further and complained most bitterly that the House was going to stand by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and pass this bill just as it is now, just as it came from the committee, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," and vote down every amendment that will be offered by any Member to strengthen the bill and make it a more perfect measure. [Laughter.]

I was astonished when I heard the gentleman make this complaint. It was a great surprise to me to hear him protest about the majority standing by its own committee. I am making no complaint, because I know it is useless, and I am not surprised that the majority will stand by the bill of the committee and vote down all amendments. I am surprised, however, that we are granted the poor privilege—for the sake of the record—of offering amendments at all to make the bill better, more perfect, more complete, and more effectual. I am surprised that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce did not go to the Committee on Rules of the House and have that committee, of which the gentleman from Ohio is an active member, bring in a rule, as it usually does, making this bill a special order and precluding a Member from offering an amendment, allowing him only the right to do one thing, and that is to vote for the bill or to vote against it. So the gentleman from Ohio complains that he is only allowed to offer an amendment with the knowledge that it is understood and agreed between the majority and the members of the committee that all amendments are to be voted down; and that the bill is to be railroaded through the House just as it came from the committee. [Applause.]

It is some consolation, however, to me to know that the gentleman from Ohio realizes once in a while that Republican chickens come home to roost. [Laughter.] But I inferred the gentleman as a last resort intended to vote for the bill. So shall I; but I do so with reluctance and many misgivings, and only because I know that it is not the best bill, but the one bill that the real and sincere friends of railroad-rate reform and governmental regulation of interstate common carriers can get for the people at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have earnestly studied the various bills which have been introduced thus far in this Congress regarding railway-rate legislation and the regulation of interstate commerce transportation companies, and briefly referred to by name and number at the beginning of the report of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee which accompanies the bill now under consideration. It will be of considerable interest, in my opinion, for the industrious Members of the House to get these respective bills and read each and every one of them carefully.

One of the best of these bills, in my judgment, is the measure introduced by my friend and colleague, Mr. HEARST, H. R. 469, entitled "A bill to increase the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and to expedite the final decision of cases arising under the act to regulate commerce by creating an interstate commerce court." This is a brief and simple bill, but a very comprehensive measure, and goes further to correct these abuses and remedy these evils than any of the bills which have heretofore been introduced, and if Mr. HEARST'S bill were a law I believe that it would effectually stop the abuses we are seeking to prevent. I am sorry the bill can not be brought before the House and voted for on its merits. It has many excellent features, and it seems to me that there are many provisions in it which the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce could to much advantage have incorporated into the bill which they reported, and if they had done so they would have made the bill now before us a very much stronger, and a very much better, and a very much more comprehensive measure in every respect; and one about whose constitutionality there could be absolutely no question.

There is to my mind no doubt about the effectiveness and the constitutionality of Mr. HEARST'S bill, and there would be no question about the constitutionality of the bill now under consideration if the provision regarding the fixing of the rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the creation of the court to review the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission were taken from Mr. HEARST'S bill and embodied in the bill of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. I think it is a matter of regret that this was not done. I go further and say I think it was a mistake that the Hearst bill was not reported to the House instead of the committee bill. There should be no politics in this matter. There should be no rivalry and no personal vanity. We ought to all strive to accomplish the results so earnestly desired by the people of this country. This is one of the great questions of the day, affecting every man, woman, and child in the land, and we should all rise superior to petty politics and personal glory and try to accomplish results; and if that had been done I believe the Hearst bill would now be under consideration instead of the pending bill; or, at all events, that many of the provisions of Mr. HEARST's bill would have been put into the bill now presented to the House, and that would have made the bill before us a very much stronger, a very much better, and a very much more comprehensive measure in every way, so far as the solution of these problems are concerned, and there would have been no question of doubt as to its constitutionality.

I believe, and I assert, that if Mr. HEARST's bill were substituted for the committee bill now under consideration we would be a great deal further advanced in the progress we are making to fix just and reasonable railway rates and to regulate transportation companies doing an interstate-commerce business. Mr. HEARST's bill meets the demands of the people, and means what it says and says what it means. Every friend of genuine railway rate reform and for the regulation of interstate transportation corporations knows what Mr. HEARST's bill will do, but no two members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce can agree as to just what the bill reported unanimously from that committee, and now before us, will accomplish if enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, let me say again that I do not think this bill is a perfect bill by any means, and I believe it can be made a very much more effective measure if it were amended along certain indicated lines. When the bill is open for amendment I shall offer several amendments to perfect and strengthen the bill, which I hope will be adopted.

I shall offer an amendment to the bill in line 15 on page 10, after the word "any," by inserting the words "relation of rates or," so that this section of the bill will read: "Or that any relation of rates or regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier." And in line 23, on the same page, after the word "what," I shall offer an amendment to insert the words "relation of rates or." This proposed amendment has been suggested by my friend and colleague, Mr. HEARST, and we deem it quite vital to the effectiveness of the measure. This bill absolutely ignores differentials and relations of rates. As the bill is now drawn a rate over one line to a given point may be just and reasonable, and a higher rate over the same line by a different route, or over another line, to another point may be also just and reasonable, and this would be an unjust discrimination that would work a great injury in favor of one city or locality as against another city or locality, and that could not be remedied by this bill if it were a law.

For instance, let us assume that the Commission should hold that the rate, we will say, from Chicago to Philadelphia of $1 per ton is just and reasonable, and a rate of $1.10 per ton from Chicago to New York over the same line, or a different line for that matter, may also be held by the Commission to be just and reasonable; and, of course, if the rates stood, as I have assumed, the traffic and the commerce would to a very large extent be diverted from the city of New York to the city of Philadelphia on account of the difference or discrimination in the relation of the rate; and this would apply to any other section of the country with equal or greater force. Thus, Philadelphia would be benefited at the expense of New York by an unjust discrimination, and New York would be powerless, under the terms of this bill, to remedy the injustice. The bill gives the Commission no power to fix a differential rate. Within recent years I am informed that nearly 1,000 complaints of unjust discriminations have been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and at least seven-tenths of all these complaints have grown out of this system of the relation of rates.

As this bill stands to-day this evil would be perpetuated and could not be corrected by the Commission even if the Commission wanted to do so. I think this is a serious defect in the bill, and it ought to be corrected by this amendment.

Then, on page 11, in line 6, of the bill I shall move the amendment heretofore referred to by striking out "thirty days after notice to the carrier" and insert the word "immediately" in lieu thereof; and in line 8 to strike out the words "be suspended;" and in line 9 to strike out the words "be suspended or" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or modified;" and also strike out the words, in the same line, "competent jurisdiction" and insert in lieu thereof the words "last resort;" so that that portion of this section will read as follows:

Such order—

That is, the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing the rate—shall go into effect immediately—

Instead of, as now provided in the bill, "thirty days after notice to the carrier"— and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be modified or set aside by the Commission, or modified or set aside by the court of last resort.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment goes to the very core of the whole matter. I have given considerable study to the bill, and I believe that the weakest part of the pending measure is in this very provision, and a bill, like a chain, is no stronger than its weakest link. If this amendment suggested by me is adopted, the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing the rate would take effect immediately and remain in full force and effect until modified or set aside by the Commission or the court of last resort. This amendment is squarely in line, and on all fours, with the recommendations of the President in his message a year ago last December. He was right then; and I say now that any other relief will be futile. As I understand it, we are legislating to remedy evils, not to encourage abuses and entail endless litigation; but under the terms of the pending bill the rate will not take effect until thirty days after notice to the carrier. I claim and I say that it ought to take effect immediately and remain in full force and effect unless modified or set aside by the Commission or modified or set aside by the court of last resort. [Applause.] Under the terms of the present bill, as I have pointed out, if the Commission makes an order fixing a rate it does not go into effect until "thirty days after notice to the carrier," and then it can be suspended, modified, or set aside by any court of competent jurisdiction.

Now, what does this mean? What will be its effect? As I read it, and as I understand it, the effect will be that when the Interstate Commerce Commission on the complaint of some injured shipper makes an order fixing a just and reasonable rate, in place of an unjust and an unreasonable rate, the transportation company will have thirty days in which to prepare a case and go into a court of competent jurisdiction and get an injunction suspending the operation of the order theretofore made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the old rate will go on until the matter is finally adjudicated by the United States Supreme Court; and this may take years and years, and in the meantime the shipper is being mulcted in the old unreasonable railroad rates and put to the expense of retaining lawyers, getting witnesses, and preparing an expensive law case that will take, perhaps, until the millenium to settle; thus causing, in my opinion, an endless delay and an useless amount of expensive litigation, and all at the expense of the injured shipper; and if he is a poor man he can not afford to incur the expense of this litigation. This bill then will give him no relief. This is one of the jokers in the bill; one of the bad features for the people, one of the good features for the transportation companies. It is the protection afforded the railroads. It is one of the reasons why, in my judgment, the railroads are not opposed to this bill. They can litigate these orders of the Commission until doomsday.

I shall offer the amendment I refer to at the proper time, and then we shall see if this bill is for the railroads or the people. The adoption or rejection of this amendment will determine the matter, in my opinion, to a very great extent. I am with the people in this fight, and I want to see placed on the statute books ere this session of Congress adjourns an effectual law that will accomplish in this matter what the people now demand. I think it will be a sad mistake if we attempt in a superficial way to temporize with this question. You may fool some of the people to-day, but you can not fool all the people to-morrow, and I predict that if we do not meet this question at this time in a square and broad and manly way the people will rebuke us, and rise up in their might and wrath and send here Representatives who will carry out their wishes and who will do the square thing, and who will write upon the statute books more stringent and more radical laws not only for Government rate making and Government regulation, but for Government control and Government ownership of the great public transportation utilities doing an interstate-commerce business. Mark what I say, it will be one relief or the other, one thing or the other, one remedy or the other. Take your choice—Government regulation now or Government ownership hereafter. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say that another amendment which I shall offer at the proper time and seek to have incorporated in the pending measure is the following, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That every common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of this act shall be liable to any of its employees who are engaged in the transportation of such persons or property, or, in the case of his death, to his personal representative or heirs at law, for all damages which may result from the negligence or mismanagement of any of its officers, agents, or employees, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways, or works.

That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery where his contributory negligence was slight in comparison to that of the employer.

That no contract of employment, insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity for injury or death entered into by or on behalf of any employee, nor the acceptance of any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity by the person entitled thereto, shall constitute any bar or defense to any action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to or death of such employee: Provided, however, That upon the trial of such action against any such common carrier by railroad the defendant may set off therein any sum it has contributed toward any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee, or, in case of his death, to his heirs at law.

That nothing in this act shall be held to limit the duty of common carriers by railroads or impair the rights of their employees under the safety-appliance act of March 2, 1893, as amended April 1, 1896, and March 2, 1903.

Mr. SULZER. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, speaks for itself, and is offered by me in good faith in the name of the hundreds of thousands of railway employees of the United States. Under existing law an employee of a railroad company can not recover damages for injuries sustained in the line of his duty by reason of the negligence of the railroad or the carelessness of a fellow-workman. This amendment makes a railroad company or a common carrier liable to the employee, and in case of his death to his heirs at law, in damages for the negligence or mismanagement of any of its officers, agents, or employees, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways, or works. This amendment is not new. It is similar to a number of employers' liability bills which have been introduced in every Congress for the past twenty years. It has been indorsed and recommended by the Industrial Commission and by some of the ablest thinkers and jurists and writers in the country. The best thought to-day in the civilized world favors this change in the law applicable to common carriers, and several States in the Union have recently adopted it.

This amendment is the one act of legislation above all others that the railroad employees of this country demand, and which they have tried to secure from Congress for the last quarter of a century. In justice to these deserving and heroic men, who daily risk their lives and their limbs in hazardous occupations, it ought to be the law of the land; and if it were I unhesitatingly assert that there would be fewer railroad accidents and less loss of life by reason of them every year in the United States.

The amendment is a just measure in the interest of a most worthy and industrious and reliable class of faithful and intelligent workmen. They are entitled to it as a matter of right and in the name of justice. A railroad company, in my judgment, should be held responsible in damages to its employees for its own carelessness and for the negligence of any of its officers or agents, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways, or works. I hope that when I offer this amendment to the pending bill when it is before the House and open to amendment—and I give notice now that I certainly shall offer it—that it will be accepted and adopted; and I know if it is adopted it will be but an act of common justice to the great army of reliable and industrious workmen of the great transportation companies, and a safeguard against accident and injury to the people generally who ride on the railroads of our country.

Make the railroads responsible in damages to their employees and take my word for it the railroads will see to it that very few accidents happen. [Applause.] If you will look over the statistics of the country, you will find that the number of railroad accidents every year is increasing, the loss of life appalling, and the list of the injured up in the hundred thousand column. Thousands of people are killed every year by railroad accidents, and tens of thousands are injured and maimed for life through the gross negligence of these interstate-commerce transportation corporations, but on account of this antiquated and unjust and discriminatory law there is no liability to the railroads. I say this old English, antique, fellow-servant doctrine, as applied to the negligence of modern railroads, is eminently unjust, and every fair-minded lawyer who has ever tried a damage suit will tell you the same thing. [Applause.] It is so ridiculous that sixteen foreign states in Europe do not now recognize it, and a majority of our own States in recent years have either abolished or modified it to a great degree. Even autocratic Russia in this regard protects her industrial railroad workers. But our own Government has yet to enact the first line of this kind of desirable legislation demanded by the vast army of patriotic and self-sacrificing railroad employees who are daily giving up their lives and their limbs to the negligence of the transportation corporations of our country.

Railroad companies by virtue of their interstate character are brought directly under the control of Congress, and therefore it is necessary from a legal standpoint for Congress to enact this law. Several State legislatures have recently met and passed such laws, but the Republicans in this House—and they have had control of the House for over ten years—have assiduously prevented the passage of this bill; and its enactment seems to be as far off, if not farther, than it was ten years ago. It seems the railroads have more influence here than the people.

But it is said by some of the Republican Members who represent districts in which these railroad employees reside that they are in favor of this legislation and would be glad to vote for it if they could only get a chance to do so. They say the Judiciary Committee, to which the bill has been referred, will not report it and give them an opportunity to vote for it. This, I say, is the merest subterfuge and no answer to the appeal of these earnest employees for relief. The Republicans can vote the day after to-morrow for this amendment when I offer it, and if it goes out on a point of order, they can vote for a rule to make the amendment germane to the bill. Did they not vote for a rule the other day to abrogate the eight-hour labor law in the Isthmian Canal Zone? Then let them vote to adopt this amendment or for a rule to make it germane to this bill. The Republicans in this House can no longer evade the issue and their responsibility. Now is the time for them to show their colors. Now is the time for them to be counted for or against this just and humane measure. [Applause.] The Republicans in this House are responsible for the failure for the last ten years to pass this bill, and I do not think the intelligent railroad men of the country, who are asking for this just and humane law, will longer permit the Republicans to deceive them regarding their failure to keep their promise made over and over again to enact this bill into law.

Sir, since 1896 the Republican party has practically promised the railroad workmen of the country this legislation, but it has absolutely failed to live up to its promise and enact the law. They have ordered several similar bills, to the amendment I have just proposed, to be killed in the Judiciary Committee. The Republicans have been in absolute power for the past ten years in all branches of the Government, and I charge that they have failed and neglected to carry out this promise, or any other promise, heretofore made to the toilers and the working people of the country. Their pledges to the working people have not been redeemed. They will not be redeemed. In passing laws for the workers of the land the Republican party is long on promise and short on performance. An ounce of performance is worth a ton of promise. I am now, always have been, and always will be a friend of the railroad employees of this country, and I sincerely believe that the amendment I propose in their interest, and which is all they ask, is not only just, but it is humane, and it should be granted to them. [Applause.] These faithful employees devote the best years of their lives to the service of large industrial corporations doing an interstate-commerce transportation business, and when they are injured in the line of their duty through the negligence of the corporation, or the carelessness of a fellow-employee, they should have the right under the law to recover damages the same as any passenger traveling for hire on the railroad. I say as a lawyer and as a legislator that any other rule is contrary to the spirit of the age. [Applause.]

The wisdom and the justice and the humanity of such a law should be apparent to all, and there is no better time than the present and no better way than the one I suggest to place this just law on the statute books. If the Republicans mean to do what they promised, they will accept my amendment and put it in this bill; if they were simply fooling the railway working people when they promised to pass this measure, they will object to it and rule it out. We shall see ere long how sincere these promising Republicans are. I believe the amendment will be germane to the pending legislation; but if it is not, I put the Republicans on notice now, and I suggest that the Republican organization of the House bring in a special rule providing that this proposed amendment in behalf of the railroad employees be made germane to his bill. The Republican organization of the House brought in a special rule the other day to put an amendment on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill suspending the eight-hour law in the Isthmian Canal Zone. If you can do it in that case, you can do it in this case. Be fair and be honest now with these deserving people. Here is the opportunity to prove your sincerity. The other day the amendment abrogating the eight-hour law was made germane to an appropriation bill quick enough when you wanted to do it, and the eight-hour law was ruthlessly "suspended" without giving the labor representatives an opportunity to be heard before a committee of this House. [Applause.]

If the Republicans are sincere in regard to their promises to the employees of the great railroad organizations of this country they will put the amendment proposed by me, and just read by the Clerk, into this railroad bill enlarging the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It appropriately belongs in this bill. Be honest and do it. The Republican party has promised the railroad working people this law, and I am offering it now as an amendment to this bill, and in my opinion it properly belongs in this bill, to see whether or not the Republicans intend to keep faith with the toilers, and to live up to their promise to the working people on the railroads of the United States. If the Republicans are sincere in what they have promised to these industrious working people they will vote to adopt this amendment, but if they simply made that promise to catch the votes of these railway employees then this amendment will not be permitted to go into this bill, but will be stricken out when I offer it, by some Republican raising the point of order; and if the point of order is sustained by the Republican Chairman of this committee on the ground that it is not germane to the bill, then I ask again that the Committee on Rules bring in a special order providing that this amendment be made germane to this bill so that every Member can vote on it. [Applause.]

Let us have a record vote and find out the truth. I believe I can safely say that every Democrat on this side of the House will vote for it. If the amendment is not incorporated into this bill it will be because the Republicans do not want it incorporated into the bill; it will be because the Republicans are insincere and have been fooling the thousands and thousands of working men employed by the great railroads and interstate transportation companies of the country.

I shall offer this amendment in good time, and I shall put to the test the sincerity of the Republicans in this House who promise the working people so much in every political campaign, and who give them so little after the campaign is over and they get back into full power in the legislative branch of the Government. I want to prove by this amendment to the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, to the Brotherhood of Railway Engineers and Firemen, and to the Brotherhood of Railway Employees who are their true friends and who are their real enemies in the Halls of Congress, and the record that will be made when this amendment is offered by me to this bill will be a light to guide railway employees in the future when they come to exercise that greatest of all American privileges—the elective franchise. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, at this time I desire to refer to another matter which I deem of some importance in connection with this pending legislation in regard to railway rates, and to give notice that when the pending bill is before the House for amendment, it is my intention to offer as an amendment my bill, now before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this House, entitled "A bill to create the Department of Transportation," which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to create the Department of Transportation.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be at the seat of Government an executive department to be known as the Department of Transportation, and a Secretary of Transportation, who shall be a Cabinet officer and the head thereof, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of $8,000 per annum, and whose term and tenure of office shall be like that of the heads of the other Executive Departments; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include such Department of Transportation, and the provisions of title 4 of the Revised Statutes, including all amendments thereto, are hereby made applicable to said Department.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in said Department a First Assistant Secretary of Transportation, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $6,000 per annum. He shall have charge of all matters in the Department of Transportation relating to steam and electric railways, and shall perform such other duties as shall be prescribed by the Secretary or required by law.

There shall be in the said Department a Second Assistant Secretary of Transportation, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum; and he shall have charge of all matters in the Department of Transportation relating to telegraph lines.

There shall be in the said Department of Transportation a Third Assistant Secretary of Transportation, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum; and he shall have charge of all matters in the Department of Transportation relating to telephone lines.

There shall be in the said Department of Transportation a Fourth Assistant Secretary of Transportation, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum; and he shall have charge of all matters in the Department of Transportation relating to waterways and similar lines of transportation thereon.

There shall be in the said Department of Transportation a Fifth Assistant Secretary of Transportation, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum; and he shall have charge of all matters of the Department of Transportation relating to pipe lines.

There shall be in the said Department of Transportation a Sixth Assistant Secretary of Transportation, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year; and he shall have charge of all matters in the Department of Transportation relating to the express business.

There shall be one chief clerk, and a disbursing clerk, and such other clerical assistance as may from time to time be authorized by Congress in each of the said assistant secretaries' departments; and the Auditor for the State and other Departments shall receive all accounts accruing in, or relative to, the Department of Transportation and examine the same and thereafter certify the balance and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificate, to the Comptroller of the Treasury for his decision thereon.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the province and duty of said Department of Transportation to inspect, examine, and regulate, as may be prescribed by law, all corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce as common carriers, or owners or operators of transportation highways; and to this end it shall be vested with jurisdiction and control of the departments, bureaus, offices, and branches of the public service hereinafter specified, and with such other powers and duties as may be prescribed by law.

SEC. 4. That the following-named offices, bureaus, divisions, and branches of the public service, now and heretofore under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and all that appertains to the same, known as the Life-Saving Service, the Light-House Board, and the Light-House Service, the Marine-Hospital Service, the Steamboat-Inspection Service, the Bureau of Navigation, and the United States Shipping Commissioner, and the same are hereby transferred from the Department of Commerce and Labor to the Department of Transportation, and the same shall hereafter remain under the jurisdiction and supervision of the last-named Department; and that the Secretary of Transportation shall have complete control of the work of gathering and distributing statistical information naturally relating to the subjects confined to his Department; and to this end said Secretary shall have power to employ any or either of said bureaus, and to rearrange such statistical work and to distribute or consolidate the same, as may be deemed desirable in the public interest; and the said Secretary shall also have authority to call upon other departments of the Government for statistical data and results obtained by them; and the Secretary of Transportation shall collate, arrange, and publish such statistical information so obtained in such manner as may to him seem wise.

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the Department of Transportation six bureaus, to be called the Bureaus of Transportation Corporations, and a chief of each of said bureaus, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to serve under each of the six assistant secretaries of the Department of Transportation, and who shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. There shall also be in each of said bureaus one chief clerk and one auditor and such number of examiners as may be needed to carry out the purposes of this act; said auditors and examiners shall be expert accountants and shall be paid a salary to be fixed by law and necessary expenses. There shall also be such other clerical assistants as may from time to time be authorized by Congress. It shall be the province and duty of said Bureaus of Transportation Corporations, under the direction of the Secretary of Transportation, to inspect, examine, and regulate all corporations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce as common carriers, or owners or operators of transportation highways, by gathering, compiling, publishing, and supplying all available and useful information concerning such corporations, including the manner in which their business is conducted, and by such other methods and means as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Transportation, or provided by law.

Every corporation governed by this act shall make annual reports in writing to the auditor, and such reports shall in all cases include:

(a) Capital authorized and issued, the amount paid up in cash or otherwise, with a statement of the method of payment where it is not in cash.

(b) Debts, including details as to the amounts thereof, and security given therefor, if any.

(c) Obligations due from officers, which shall be separately stated.

(d) A statement of assets and the method of valuing the same, whether at cost price, by appraisal, or otherwise, and of the allowance made for depreciation. Small items of personal property included in the plant may be described by the term "sundries" or like general term.

(e) Gross earnings for the period covered by the report, all deductions necessary for interest, taxes, and expenses of all sorts, the surplus available for dividends, and dividends actually declared.

(f) Increase of assets since the last statement, with a showing in what way such increase has been secured.

(g) The names and addresses of all stockholders, with the number of shares held by each at the date of the report.

(h) The amount of stock disposed of and the amount of property taken for stock sold since the last report, with all facts necessary to show the result of the transaction.

(i) A statement showing that the corporation in question has not, during the period covered by the said report, received or given any rebates, drawbacks, special rates, or other discriminating advantages, or preferences by money payments or otherwise, from or to any railroad, pipe line, water carrier, or other transportation company or paid to any shipper any such payments; or if any such have been received or given, stating to whom, from whom, on what account, and in what manner they were so received or given, with all other details necessary for the full understanding of the transaction or transactions.

(j) The names and addresses of all officers, location of transfer or registry offices, wherever located.

(k) A statement that the corporation has not fixed prices or done any other act with a view to restricting trade or driving any competitor out of business.

(l) A statement that the corporation is or is not a party to any contract, combination, or conspiracy in the form of a trust or otherwise, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or Territories or with foreign nations.

(m) It shall be the duty of the auditor of each Bureau of Transportation Corporations to prescribe the form of the reports before mentioned. He may, in his discretion, require additional reports at any time, upon reasonable notice, whenever he may see fit. But his determination shall be prima facie proof that the notice given is reasonable.

He may also require supplemental reports whenever, in his judgment, the report rendered is in any particular or particulars insufficient, evasive, or ambiguous.

He may prescribe rules so as to avoid undue detail in making the reports, but no detail of the business of the corporation shall be considered private so as to be exempt from the examination of the auditor whenever he may demand report thereon.

He shall make public in his reports, which shall be issued annually, all the information contained in the reports so made to him. When a report has been made by a corporation and, with all supplemental and additional reports required by the auditor, shall have been approved by him, the corporation making such report or reports shall publish the same in some newspaper nearest to its principal place of business, after the usual custom in such cases, with the auditor's minutes of approval, and shall file with the auditor proof of such publication by the publisher's certificate.

SEC. 6. That if any corporation shall fail to make a report when required, either by the terms of this act or when required by the auditor, as herein provided, said corporation shall be fined not less than one-twentieth of 1 per cent of its last annual gross earnings for each offense. Every week of failure after such reasonable written demand has been made by the auditor shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. In case also of failure, each of the directors of the said corporation shall be ineligible for the year succeeding the next annual meeting to hold either directorship or any other office in the said corporation; but any director shall be exempt from said penalty upon making a statement under oath that he has individually made such a report to the best of his ability from the facts at his disposal.

If such report is false in any material respect the officer making same shall be guilty of perjury and the corporation shall be fined not less than ten thousand nor more than fifty thousand dollars, and each false statement in any material matter shall constitute a separate offense. All fines and penalties imposed by this act shall be recovered or enforced in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the examiners, under the direction of the auditor, to make examinations of any corporation governed by this act.

Any of said examiners presenting his official credentials shall be furnished by the officers of the corporation with every facility for complete and full examination, not only of the books, but all of the property, records, or papers of the corporation, which may be necessary, in the judgment of the examiner, for a complete knowledge of the affairs of the concern.

Such examinations shall not be at fixed periods, but shall be at such times as the auditor shall fix and without notice.

Examiners shall have the power to examine under oath all officers or employees of the corporation, or any other persons having any knowledge of its affairs, and to send for, demand, and inspect books, papers, and any other matter of evidence whatever which is in the possession or control of the said corporation.

For the purpose of this act examiners shall have power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing, and in case of disobedience to a subpœna the examiner may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance.

And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal of any witness to obey a subpœna issued to any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before said examiner (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as and for a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to incriminate the person giving such evidence or testimony shall not excuse such person from testifying; but such testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

The auditor shall also have all the authority of an examiner in any case wherein he chooses himself to act.

No examiner shall be assigned to examine any corporation who is himself interested in the business thereof, or of any competing concern, or who has relatives who are so interested.

It shall be unlawful for an examiner to divulge private business except by his report to the auditor. But such report, or the substance thereof, shall be open to public inspection.

Each examiner shall follow the rules, regulations, and directions which the auditor may from time to time lay down or communicate to him as to the method of examination, the form of report, the matters to be covered by the said examination, and all matters pertaining to his duties.

Said examinations and reports shall always cover, among others, the following questions and matters:

(a) Has the said corporation, or any officer thereof, during period covered by the examination and report, given or received any rebates, drawbacks, special rates, or other discriminations, advantages, preferences, by money payments, or otherwise, to or from any railroad, pipe line, water carrier, or other transportation company, or person engaged in interstate commerce, or from any manufacturer or vender of any supplies or materials purchased by or for said corporation.

(b) If there have been such preferences when they were received or given, from whom or to whom, on what account and in what manner, giving all details necessary to a full understanding of the transaction.

(c) Is the said corporation or any of its officers a member of any combination having, seeking, or intending to secure a monopoly of any commodity other than such monopolies as are legally granted by patents or otherwise?

(d) Has the said corporation any such monopoly or does it use methods tending to secure such monopoly?

(e) Has it made any contracts or agreements tending to secure any such monopoly to itself or any other concern, whether owned by an individual or individuals, a corporation, or some combination of individuals or corporations?

(f) Is such corporation, or any of its officers, a party to any contract, agreement, combination, or conspiracy, in the form of a trust or otherwise, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations?

(g) Has the corporation, or any of its officers, purchased or does it hold the stock of any other corporation for the purpose of controlling its management?

Said reports of the examiners shall be prima facie evidence as to their truth, and may be introduced in evidence in all courts to prove the facts therein set forth. Copies certified by the Auditor shall be admissible with like effect and under the same circumstances as the original.

The word "corporation," wherever used in this act, shall be deemed to include companies and associations existing or authorized by the laws of the United States, the laws of any State or Territory, or the laws of any foreign country.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of Transportation shall annually, at the close of each fiscal year, make a report in writing to the Congress, giving an account of all money received and disbursed by him and his Department, and describing the work done by the Department in inspecting, examining, and regulating, as prescribed by law, all corporations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce; in the ownership, or operation, of any of the foregoing-described transportation highways or lines of transportation or engaged as common carriers in interstate or foreign commerce, and making such recommendations as he shall deem necessary for the effective performance of the duties and purposes of the Department. He shall also, from time to time, make such special investigations and reports as he may be required to do by the President, or by either House of Congress, or which he himself may deem necessary and urgent.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of Transportation shall have charge of the building or premises occupied by or appropriated to and for the Department of Transportation, of the library, furniture, fixtures, records, and other property appertaining to it, or hereafter required for use in its business; and he shall be allowed to expend for periodicals and the purposes of the library and for the rental of appropriate quarters for the accommodation of the Department of Transportation within the District of Columbia, and for all other incidental expenses such sums as Congress may provide from time to time: Provided, however, That where any office, bureau, or branch of the public service transferred to the Department of Transportation by this act is occupying rented buildings or premises it may still continue to do so until other suitable quarters are provided for its use: And provided further, That all officers, clerks, and employees now employed in any of the bureaus, offices, departments, or branches of the public service referred to in this act transferred to the Department of Transportation are each and all hereby transferred to said Department at their present grades and salaries except where otherwise provided: And provided further, That all laws prescribing the work and defining the duties of the several bureaus, offices, departments, or branches of the public service by this act transferred to and made a part of the Department of Transportation shall, so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, remain in force and effect until provided by law.

But nothing in this act shall be construed as in any way abandoning any of the powers over interstate commerce and interstate carriers conferred by the interstate commerce act.

SEC. 14. That this act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the bill just read by the Clerk, introduced by me, to create the Department of Transportation, is a most comprehensive measure, dealing in a logical way and a practicable manner with this great interstate-commerce transportation problem. The measure provides for particular officials in the new department to investigate, report on, and regulate steam and electric railways, telegraphs, telephones, waterway traffic, pipe lines, and the express business. Powers are conferred on the department to obtain full information not only as to rates and other traffic arrangements, but as to the genuine capital employed, the resources and liabilities, earnings, dividends, etc.; and penalties, rather more severe than those usually made for the tender discipline of lawless corporations, are fixed, such as heavy fines and ineligibility of directors to retain their office when they have made false reports or defied the officials seeking information. The purpose of the bill is not to interfere with the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission in examining into and regulating rates, but to assist in the work of compelling the transportation companies to obey the law, as all others are expected to do; and if this bill were placed on the statute books, I feel confident it would help very much, and go very far to solve some of the intricate questions presented by these powerful interstate transportation systems.

I believe, sir, that if a simple bill were prepared and enacted into law, making the giving or receiving of a rebate a felony, and the power conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission, where rates were unjust and unreasonable, to fix just and reasonable rates and maintain the same, unless modified or set aside by the court of last resort, and my bill, which has just been read by the Clerk, placed by its side on the statute books, that the cause of the people would triumph, that the Government would control the situation, and be able to fix the rates and regulate the great interstate transportation systems of our country, instead of the great interstate transportation companies controlling and dominating the Government. [Applause.]

I have given much time and careful study to the problems which we have been debating here for the past week, and which are and have been live questions before the people of this country for the past ten or fifteen years; and I believe that if we had a Department of Transportation to regulate the railroads and the transportation companies of the country, as provided in my bill, and to see to it that they did not violate the law, and if they did violate the law that the penalties of existing laws were speedily enforced against them, I believe that most of the problems would be solved and the question at issue settled in justice to all and with injury to none.

This bill of mine, sir, to create the Department of Transportation has been approved in editorials by some of the leading American newspapers. It has met with most favorable comment by many of the leading political writers and philosophical thinkers and railway economists of the land; and I believe that sooner or later this bill of mine, or some measure of a similar character, will be enacted into law by the Congress of the United States. It is the first attempt that has ever been made in this country to deal with this interstate-transportation problem in a scientific manner and a practicable business way. And just in this connection I want to have read a letter from the American Anti-Trust League, a well-known nonpartisan organization of earnest and determined and patriotic and liberty-loving Americans, who have done and are doing most effective work for reform, for good government, for the enforcement of the laws against the criminal trusts, for honest and just and equal laws, and for every righteous struggle in the cause of the plain people, and who are organized for influential work in every State in the Union. I ask the Clerk to read to the House the following letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

M. L. Lockwood, national president; H. B. Martin, national secretary; C. T. Bride, national treasurer; W. B. Fleming, national financial secretary; William M. Morgan, national recording secretary.

National executive committee.—M. L. Lockwood (chairman), Pennsylvania; H. B. Martin (secretary), New York; F. S. Monnett, Ohio; P. E. Dowe, New York; F. J. Van Vorhis, Indiana; W. T. LaFollette, South Dakota; James Barrett, Georgia; William Prentiss, Illinois; C. T. Bride, District of Columbia; H. J. Schulteis, District of Columbia; W. B. Fleming, Kentucky; W. A. L. Riegel, New York.

"Salus populi suprema est lex."

THE AMERICAN ANTI-TRUST LEAGUE,
NATIONAL OFFICE, 1229 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE NW.,
Washington, D. C., January 20, 1906.

DEAR SIR: The national executive committee of the American Anti-Trust League believing that the prompt and thorough enforcement of the laws governing the great transportation corporations now in control of the transportation business of the nation is of most vital importance to the whole people, and believing, after a careful examination of its main features, that H. R. 8453, the bill creating a department of transportation, introduced by Congressman WILLIAM SULZER, of New York, is a much needed and effective step toward securing the proper enforcement of the laws regulating transportation, we hereby heartily indorse the said bill and urge upon Congress that it be enacted into law at the present session for the following reasons:

First. Because at the present time there is no proper provision for the enforcement of the laws governing the vast transportation business of the United States.

Second. Because H. R. 8453 provides for a thoroughly competent department of the Government, charged with the sole duty of securing an effective enforcement of the laws and regulations governing the transportation industry.

Third. The creating of such an executive department of transportation, clothed with the comprehensive supervisory and regulative powers provided in Congressman SULZER'S bill, will act as a powerful preventive of many violations of the law and will secure prompt punishment of the great corporate offenders who now seem to be beyond the reach of the law.

Fourth. Such a department of transportation, as provided in H. R. 8453, will secure full publicity in the workings of the transportation corporations, and thus prevent those numerous violations of the laws, which are only made possible because of their secrecy.

Fifth. The secret rebates and discriminations of the carriers which have built up the great criminal trusts will be prevented by the provisions embodied in Mr. SULZER'S bill.

Sixth. The Interstate Commerce Commission being relieved of the enormous details of the executive duty of attempting to enforce the laws, will be able to much more effectively perform its proper function of regulating rates, classifications, etc.

Seventh. The defiance, both open and secret, of the laws by the great transportation corporations, which has become a national scandal and an intolerable abuse, can be easily put a stop to by the provisions for policing the railroad corporations and other transportation companies embodied in the Sulzer bill.

Eighth. H. R. 8453 also provides an effective check upon the great evils connected with the corrupt influence in elections, of the enormous contributions to the campaign funds of favored political parties and candidates which now prevails.

Ninth. H. R. 8453 greatly simplifies the work of government regulation and enforcement of existing laws relating to this vast transportation business by providing what we should always be extremely careful to maintain, viz, the complete separation of the legislative and executive branches of our government machinery.

For these reasons, and others that will readily commend themselves to all who carefully consider the provisions of the Department of Transportation bill (H. R. 8453), we request all friends of the proposed law to use their influence through commercial and industrial organizations, through the press, and with their Congressmen and Senators, to secure the passage of the bill at the present session of Congress.

NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE
AMERICAN ANTITRUST LEAGUE.
H. B. MARTIN, National Secretary.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that letter from the American Anti-Trust League of the United States, indorsing my bill to create the Department of Transportation, speaks for itself. It is a bugle call in no uncertain tones to every friend of governmental regulation of interstate transportation corporations to favor and aid in the enactment of the legislation proposed in my bill, and needs from me no further comment.

It is only just for me to say, however, that I have received numerous letters from all over the country in favor of this bill to create the Department of Transportation to regulate the great interstate transporation companies of the country and to be able to see to it that they obey the law and do no injury to the people. I have taken this opportunity to put the bill in the RECORD as a part of my speech to give notice to the Members of the House that I shall offer it as an amendment to the pending bill when the bill is open for amendment; and to get my measure, with all that it means, before the people generally of the country, so that those who are really interested in this great transportation question can read it for themselves, in connection with the matters now under discussion, and can study its features and their application to the problems we are endeavoring to solve; and I believe that those who look deeply and carefully into the subject and who truly and earnestly desire to accomplish something of a permanent character to compel the railways and other interstate transportation corporations, including the steamboats, the telegraph, the telephone, the express, and the pipe line companies, to obey the law of the land, will agree with me, that this proposed legislation, embodied in this bill introduced by me, goes further than any other plan heretofore conceived to treat all the matters involved in this discussion in a practical business way and in a comprehensive governmental manner. [Applause.]

I shall do my best, Mr. Chairman, in Congress and out of Congress, to make this bill a law. I do not say it is perfect. I know in the first instance that no proposed constructive legislation is absolutely perfect; but I do claim that it is practicable, that it is comprehensive, that it is constitutional, and that it will go further in every way than any other plan thus far proposed to effectually check the evils which have grown up during the last twenty-five years in connection with our interstate transportation corporations, and do more than any other thing thus far suggested to remedy all the interstate transportation evils so bitterly complained of, at the present time, by the people of the United States. I shall welcome letters of approval, or suggestions and criticisms concerning this bill, from any and every citizen of our country who will take the trouble to study this broad and complete measure and the time to write me his views concerning it.

If it is claimed that the enactment of this bill into law would create additional offices and more expense to the Government, I answer, that if the people can get the right kind of men to occupy these offices, created in this bill, the gain will be the people's gain; and so far as the expense is concerned it will be infinitesimal in comparison with the importance of the data and statistics which will be procured, and the magnitude of the work which can be accomplished all along the line of the people's desires and demands. I say, and those who have studied this subject sufficiently to speak intelligently about it I think will agree with me, that the real solution of the problems presented in connection with the evils growing out of abuses by great interstate transportation systems is publicity and the rigid and prompt enforcement of the law, and this can only be done and accomplished by Government regulation and Government supervision of these interstate transportation corporations. It is just as practicable from a business view, and a governmental standpoint, as the supervision and the regulation by the Government of the national banks, and I say just as necessary. The railroads must be the servants of the people—not their masters.

This bill is in the interest of the toilers of our land, the shippers and producers of our country, and the people generally. If there be any genuine opposition to this legislation it comes from the interstate transportation systems that are violating the law, and dread publicity, and fear exposure, and speedy punishment through the agencies created by this bill for governmental supervision and regulation. I say the bill is a good bill, a just bill, a comprehensive bill, and a feasible constructive scheme of practical legislation along proper and intelligent lines to eradicate intrenched wrongs that are to-day oppressing the people and doing a great injustice to the citizens of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, legislative reforms are things of slow growth. It takes years of agitation to create sufficient public opinion to write a new law upon the statute books in the interest of all the people. But how different concerning the wishes of the selfish few. A great trust battening on the people's credulity, or a great monopoly fattening on special privilege and nurtured by political favoritism, can come to the halls of Congress and pass a bill for its own selfish interests and greedy purposes during the lifetime of a single session. It takes, however, a long time for the people to win; but the truth will and must eventually prevail if one man dare assert it every day. So the truth of this proposition will win in the end.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, I shall offer this bill of mine as an amendment to the pending measure when the bill is open for amendment in the House. I believe my bill is germane to the proposition we are at present discussing and will not be subject to a point of order, but whether it is or not, I want to give notice now that I am in earnest in my contention for the enactment into law of this bill, and I shall keep up the fight week in and week out until the matter is properly presented to the House and an opportunity given for discussion and a vote taken upon it on its merits. The vast extent of the interstate transportation problem and the pressing and urgent importance of legislative remedies to correct existing evils to all the people of the United States are ample warrant for Congress to give this question the deepest investigation and the fullest consideration. There are many bills now before Congress affecting this question, some good, some bad, some indifferent, but no one of the bills, in my opinion, is a complete solution of all the questions involved in the problem. Hence the disposition on the part of some of the Republican leaders, which must be manifest to all, to rush through some plainly imperfect bill, to railroad to the Senate some defective measure, and then attempt to wash their hands of all further responsibility in the matter, as was done in the last Congress with the Esch-Townsend bill, is a procedure that should not commend itself to the Members of this House, and I know will not be approved by the people.

I do not claim that my bill is a panacea for all the evils growing out of the interstate transportation problem. But I do assert that my bill proposes to settle, and settle right and for a long time to come, a most important phase of this abstruse and intricate question, and to do it in a thorough, prompt, practical, effective, and businesslike way, by publicity, and by the enforcement of the laws of our country affecting every company and corporation doing an interstate-commerce transportation business. This will include all railways, all steamboats, all express companies, all pipe lines, all telephone lines, and all telegraph lines, and the Government will be able to make investigations, secure the information, collect the data, and effectually deal with the questions involved through the instrumentalities created in this bill in an intelligent way and a comprehensive manner. [Applause.]

If this bill becomes a law the Government will be in a position to have in its power the agency to gather data, ascertain facts, get information, make investigations, enforce its orders, and prevent evils and wrongs by the strict and speedy execution of the laws now on the statute books, and if those laws are not sufficient to stop the evils complained of by the people, then the Government can recommend to Congress the enactment of additional laws to effectually eradicate every evil in connection with the interstate transportation problem.

Mr. Chairman, in studying this great question I am satisfied that three things are absolutely necessary to be done, at the present time, to effectually deal with the problems arising from the abuses of these interstate transportation systems.

First, there must be a body like the Interstate Commerce Commission, clothed with the right and authority to make just, fair, and reasonable rates in place of unjust, unfair, and unreasonable rates, and have these rates take effect immediately, and remain in full force and effect until modified or set aside by the Commission; or modified or set aside by the court of last resort. This is an administrative function and should be the sole and only power under the constitutional limitations of our Government conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Second. There must be a body clothed with authority to determine controversies, review the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and interpret the laws of Congress governing and regulating transportation. This is a judicial function, and should properly be vested in the courts of our country.

Third. There should be an executive department in the National Government, with a Cabinet officer at its head, charged with the responsibility and the sole duty of the prompt and thorough enforcement of the laws of the United States concerning companies and corporations doing an interstate-commerce business. My bill creates this department. This is an executive function, and belongs to the executive branch of the Government; and these three functions should always be kept separate and distinct.

Now, sir, I think I have stated the proposition broadly and briefly. I have drawn my bill to create such a department in the executive branch of the Government, for the effective and speedy enforcement of the laws governing every company, and every corporation, and every common carrier doing an interstate-commerce business. My plan is in line with the true principles of our institutions from the days of the fathers down to the present time, and when it is adopted by Congress, and it must be adopted sooner or later, it will provide the quickest agency for the proper and speedy execution of the laws against flagrant violations of our statutes; and, to my mind, after mature reflection and careful consideration I believe it will prove an effectual remedy for the principal evils we are trying to check and to stop; and for once and for all time eradicate from the body politic and our system of government the lawless abuses of the great and the powerful interstate-transportation companies of our country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VREELAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad rate bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

The Chair submits to the House that, if there is no objection, the committee will be discharged from further consideration and the Senate bill will lie on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the blown-down timber and the standing merchantable timber on the sections containing blown-down timber on the Menominee Indian Reservation, in Wisconsin, as herein provided, such sale to be in addition to the amount authorized to be sold annually by the act of June 12, 1890 (26 Stat. SEC. 4. That this act shall be and remain inoperative until full and satisfactory evidence shall have been placed on the files of the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that the sales of timber and the manner of disposing of the proceeds of same herein authorized have the sanction of the tribe, evidenced by orders of agreement taken in full council.

With the following amendments recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Insert after the word "timber," near the end of line 6, page 1, "in the north half of township No. 29, range No. 13 east, the north half of township No. 29, range No. 14 east, and in the south half of township No. 30, range No. 13 east."

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS ACTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. PATTERSON on the 5th instant, as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislatures thereof," and that "each Senator shall have one vote;" and

Whereas each Senator, before assuming the duties of his office, is required to solemnly swear or affirm that he "will support and defend the Constitution of the United States, and that he will faithfully discharge the duties of the office upon which he is about to enter;" and

Whereas, because it was currently reported that one or more Democratic Senators might vote upon certain matters pending before the Senate contrary to the views of a majority of the body of Democratic Senators, the Democratic Senators were called to caucus upon such matters; and

Whereas it was found at such caucus that said reports were correct, and that certain Democratic Senators might or would vote contrary to the views of said majority; and

Whereas thereupon the following resolutions were presented and adopted by more than two-thirds of the Senators present at said caucus:

"Resolved, That the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Santo Domingo, now pending before the Senate.

"Resolved, That if two-thirds of this caucus shall vote in favor of the foregoing resolution it shall be the duty of every Democratic Senator to vote against the ratification of the said treaty;" and

Whereas the apparent purpose of said resolutions and action was to improperly induce or coerce Democratic Senators who might believe that the best interests of the country required the ratification of said treaty, and because thereof held it to be their duty to vote for its ratification, into disregarding that part of their oaths in which they declared that they would faithfully discharge the duties of the office of Senator: Therefore, be it

Resolved, First. That such action by the said or any other caucus is in plain violation of the spirit and intent of the Constitution of the United States.

Second. That for two-thirds or any other number of the Senators of any party to meet and declare that "it shall be the duty" of any Senator to vote upon any question other than as his own convictions impel him is a plain violation of the manifest intent and spirit of the Constitution all have sworn to uphold and defend.

Third. That the "one vote" the Constitution declares each Senator shall have is his own vote and not the vote of any other or of any number of other Senators, and for a Senator to cast that "one vote" against his convictions of right and duty in the premises is to disfranchise his State in the Senate and to deprive it of the representation in that body the Constitution provides it shall have.

Fourth. That when any number of Senators by combination or otherwise undertake, through any species of coercion, to induce other Senators to vote except as their judgments and consciences tell them, it is an invasion of the rights of a State to equal representation with other States in the Senate, and is subversive of their rights to equal representation and the votes of its Senators in the Senate that the Constitution has provided for.

Fifth. That the Senator who permits any body of other Senators to declare and define for him what his duty is in the matter of his vote in the Senate, and who casts his vote in response to such interference, votes not as a Senator from his own State, but as a Senator from the other States, and he augments the power of the other States beyond that permitted by the Constitution and weakens and degrades the power of his own State in the Senate, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

Sixth. That for any Senator to vote except as his judgment and sense of duty under his oath of office requires is to degrade the high office of Senator and to assail the dignity and standing of the Senate of the United States—qualities possessed in such high degree by no other legislative body in the world.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, before I discuss the resolution I had the honor to offer I want to say a few words that are personal. There is nothing I dislike more than either to thrust my own personality into a question of serious public importance or to see other Senators do so. Occasionally conditions are such that it would seem to be necessary.

I am here at this time discussing these resolutions much against my inclination. When last week I addressed the Senate upon the Santo Domingo treaty I had no reason to suppose but that my remarks, as the others I have from time to time made in the Senate, would be considered about as inconsequential, and would be passed over without arousing any unusual interest or controversy. But it seems, whether by reason of the remarks or some other cause, a caucus of Senators of the party to which I belong was almost immediately held and certain resolutions were adopted.

In view of the fact that one of the distinguished Senators upon this side of the Chamber had, in a perfectly courteous way, spoken to me immediately before I spoke and told me that he hoped I would not commit myself upon the treaty, that the Democratic Senators would hold a caucus and would probably act upon it, and that in the face of that suggestion I proceeded with my remarks, I feel that I come directly within the intended censure of the resolutions. It was not suggested by the Senator I have in mind that it was proposed to throw any new light upon the treaty, but I inferred that the Democratic caucus would probably instruct upon it, and as I had made up my mind what my duty was, with the light I then had, with the very considerable investigation I had given to the matter, I felt there was no reason why I should either desist or change the course of my remarks as I had arranged them.

The action of the caucus was to make me rather a conspicuous figure in the public prints. Such suggestions as "A White House Democrat," "The Senator from Colorado has been read out of his party," "The Senator from Colorado is a bolter from his party," flew thick and fast; and to those who have not known me and my course and the motives that I trust actuate me in my public action, the impression was almost necessarily created that the step I had taken was from selfish and somewhat indefensible motives, either, as was stated by a leading New York paper, that there was probably some understanding between the President and myself about my reelection to the Senate, or that I had some postmasters or custom-house officials to my credit, or that I expected to secure some, and that such and like motives and such interests had led me to take what they saw fit to describe as a remarkable step.

Mr. President, no man likes to have his motives misconstrued, especially if he believes they are honorable motives. As to the President and patronage, immediate or in the past or in the future, having had any influence whatever over my course, I think it is due both to the President and myself that the facts should be stated.

I have been in the Senate now five years. During all of that time I have never requested the President to make a single appointment with one exception, and that was in the recess of Congress last fall, when I sent him a letter from Denver, asking him to appoint a most excellent young Episcopalian clergyman to a vacant chaplaincy in a regiment in the Philippines. The minister in mind, the Rev. Mr. Eustis, who had been officiating in Denver for a number of years, formerly lived in Vermont or Maine, I forget now which, and he had on file in the War Department the recommendations of the Republican Senators of the State from which he came for a like position. In writing to the President I suggested that since there was no politics in selecting an agent to point to soldiers their road to heaven, I thought I might venture in that case to depart from the rule of conduct in dealing with appointments which I had adopted when I first came to the capital. I was almost immediately and politely informed that the chaplain whose resignation created the vacancy was a Methodist, and that one of that denomination would be selected for his place. The result of it was Mr. Eustis is still performing the duties of pastor of a Denver church, and I suppose that some good Methodist is now drawing the salary and performing the duties of a chaplain.

With that exception, and the writing of a few letters commendatory of the character and capacity of some Colorado applicants who were seeking appointments through the Congressmen from Colorado, no appeal, directly or indirectly, has ever been made by me to the President for a position.

The last interview I had with the President was about a month ago. I went to him with a delegation of Colorado cattle owners for the purpose of protesting against rules that had been adopted for the government of the forest reserves in our State, under which regulations the owners of stock are compelled to pay licenses all the way from 5 or 6 or 7 or 8 cents a head for sheep to 60, 70, and 80 cents per head for cattle to graze on the part of the public domain within the forest reserves. I felt that the President had stepped outside of his powers in practically enacting laws—license laws—a right that devolves under the Constitution upon Congress, and I sought to convince him that for that and other reasons the regulations should be annulled. I should say that the regulations were made under the authority or by the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, but of course, as stated by the President, with the approval of himself. I was courteously informed that the change could not be made.

I visited him the next day and had a very earnest interview with him. I might give a part of the interview. After we had talked a considerable length of time he said, "Senator PATTERSON, may I talk to you plainly without offending you?" I said, "Yes, Mr. President, if you will permit me to talk plainly to you without offending you." The bargain was struck, and he expressed himself in quite unmeasured terms. Then I had my say. The result of it was that the interview suddenly ended. We were courteous, however, only both were emphatic. The regulations remain undisturbed.

From that day to this, Mr. President, I have had no interview with the President upon any subject. I have met him, as nearly every other Senator and Member of Congress has met him, casually and on social occasions, but these are very few, and there my official relations with the President commenced and ended.

I think that so much is due to the President, for it is not a very commendable thing to charge the President with buying a Senator's vote with patronage, or to impute that a Senator has sold his vote to him for patronage.

As I said in the remarks I previously made, I have, notwithstanding the scant relations between the President and myself, a very warm feeling of friendship for him by reason of his public course. There are many things he has done that I do not approve of, that I have condemned upon the floor of the Senate as earnestly as I could and keep within the courtesies of Senatorial debate. I expect I will continue to do so.

But, Mr. President, I feel, as I stated before, that in the struggle he is making along economic lines, in dealing with the great railroad question, in dealing with the great trust and monopoly question, he is making such a fight as no President, except Andrew Jackson, has ever undertaken to make before; and I admire and commend him for the brave, courageous stand that he has taken, and the unflinching manner in which he is proceeding in the struggle.

With reference to the Santo Domingo treaty, Mr. President, I believe it should be adopted. But suggestions have also been made in the press, and by my colleagues, as I have been informed, that in any event I am not very firmly allied to the Democratic party, and that I have boxed the political compass. That is a mistake. I did, in 1892, repudiate the nomination of Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Colorado——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question there? He said that he favors the treaty and expects to vote for it. Does the Senator mean without amendment?

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, no. I go upon the theory that the Santo Domingo treaty will receive the careful and patriotic consideration of the Senate, and that in many of its features that are considered objectionable, both by Senators upon the opposite side and this, it will be amended.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator mean to say that he objects to certain features of it as it was negotiated by the President?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not object to the main purposes of the treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. But as to any features?

Mr. PATTERSON. There are features of the treaty concerning which the Committee on Foreign Relations has already reported amendments to this body. Senators upon the other side of the Chamber have offered other amendments. Every one of those amendments, so far as I have had opportunity to consider them, I am in favor of.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the Senator is not in favor of the treaty as it was negotiated?

Mr. PATTERSON. If the treaty is not amended, as I believe it should be, yet maintaining the main objective features of the treaty and eliminating matters that I believe should be eliminated, then, Mr. President, I will take that new condition into very careful consideration, and in the end do what I think I should do under my oath as a Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator permit me now to make a suggestion through the Chair to the Senate?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. Inasmuch as we have discussed the attitude of the Senator on this floor toward this treaty and toward the amendments that are said to have been reported, I wish to say that I shall claim the privilege of discussing this entire treaty in open Senate at the proper time.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is a matter which the Senator, I suppose, must determine for himself "with the advice and consent of the Senate." But, Mr. President, I am in favor of the main features of that treaty and the object that it seeks to attain, which is to bring peace and a substantial condition to the financial affairs of the island, to pay off its indebtedness upon an equitable basis, that is crowding the island to the wall, that is making it the threatened prey of foreign nations—to improve conditions that demand at the hands of some country wise and material assistance, and if that assistance is to be rendered, I do not propose to so act as to force upon Santo Domingo and foreign nations the performance of the duty. I prefer that my own country—as I believe it to be its duty under a fair interpretation and application of the Monroe doctrine—shall perform its duty.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. PATTERSON. With great pleasure.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to ask the Senator if he knows how any other Senator would vote on this treaty if it were amended to suit him? The Senator says that he will vote for it if it is amended to suit him. I ask him if he knows how any other Senator will vote if it be amended to suit him?

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me read a resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Santo Domingo, now pending before the Senate.

It is not a proposition——

Mr. DANIEL. I understand it is the Senator's opinion that he ought not to vote for this treaty, but that if amended to suit him he will vote for it.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is hardly a correct interpretation of my opinion as I expressed it. In the first place, I would say, in response to the Senator from Virginia, that these resolutions do not suggest that the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the treaty unless it is amended, but that it should not advise and consent to it at all. The treaty was before the Senate in executive session with amendments reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, which, in my judgment, would come pretty nearly removing every reasonable objection, and we have a right to suppose that when the Committee on Foreign Relations reports amendments the Senate will adopt them, especially when they are amendments which are concurred in by the members of both political parties that comprise this august body.

I was going to refer to a matter that is personal when I was very properly interrupted, that refers to my supposed political tergiversation. I did, in 1892, Mr. President, leave the Democratic party, and I became a Populist. I had no idea that the Populist party would become a great national party. I knew that there was room in this country for but two great parties—the Democratic and the Republican—but the Democratic party in 1892 had fallen so far behind that I concluded to get into another wagon and ride on ahead until the Democratic party had caught up, and then I would renew my membership in the party that is a part of the very life and existence of the country.

Mr. President, I am proud of my relations with the Populist party. It performed a wonderful work. I recollect down in South Carolina when the leading Democrats, with my friend from that State [Mr. TILLMAN] at their head, saw the Democratic organization disintegrating and flocking into the Populist ranks, he organized the Democratic party on Populist lines, adopted all of its asserted principles and measures, and gave to them the name "Democratic," and thus held the Democratic party together in his State until the Democratic party of the nation caught up with him, and he has been traveling along like me with the Democratic party ever since.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator at this stage of the proceedings, but lest I might not recur to that phase of my political career in anything that I might have to say later on, I want to remark to the Senator that I have eaten as much crow in submitting to the dictates of party conventions as any man living. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. Did you like it?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, I did not; but I had to take it all the same. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I have eaten some crow, but I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina that the crow that I ate was not so rank as the crow he ate and of which he boasts, because I did, in 1892, without any hesitation, support Mr. Weaver for the Presidency, and I am gratified that, due in part to my humble efforts, the vote of Colorado was cast for him. I have repudiated the action of some conventions at home, and in all human probability before I die I will repudiate more, for I do not believe it is in the power of any political convention to force upon decent men dishonest and otherwise improper candidates to fill offices to the disgrace of the party and to assist in compassing its defeat in future campaigns.

Mr. President, the resolution of the caucus that led to my resolution is the second one, but I will now read both:

Resolved, That the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Santo Domingo, now pending before the Senate.

The second resolution reads:

Resolved, That if two-thirds of this caucus shall vote in favor of the foregoing resolution it shall be the duty of every Democratic Senator to vote against the ratification of the said treaty.

"It shall be the duty of every Democratic Senator to vote against the ratification of the said treaty." Mr. President, is that persuasion or is it coercion? To be sure, when a resolution of that kind is adopted by a caucus, the members of it know that they can not take a Senator who is unwilling to submit by the scruff of the neck and hold him up when the roll is called until he votes. They do know, Mr. President, that if a Senator who is unwilling to be bound by a resolution of that kind refuses to be bound, in a majority of cases the gravest injury has been done to him.

In the North and in the South there are States in which the contest is simply for a nomination and not for an election. At the present time there are Senators absent from their seats, in their home States canvassing before the people for their approval and renomination. Imagine one of those Senators, high-minded, conscientious, consistent, and desiring to be mindful of the obligations of his oath, confronted with a caucus resolution such as this, whether it be upon the Santo Domingo treaty or upon any other question, and he in his conscience disapproves it and believes that it is not for the best interests of the country that the measure should be, it may be, adopted or it may be defeated—confronted with such a resolution at the very climax of his campaign for renomination. Why, Mr. President, he must either bottle up his convictions and say to the caucus, "You may vote me; I turn over my duty upon this measure into your hands," or he is certain to be defeated for a renomination. Take either of the several Senators who are now canvassing for the support of their constituents for a renomination and let it be proclaimed, whether in a State of the North or in a State of the South, that he is a bolter from his party, and his political doom is sealed.

I say, Mr. President, that this sort of coercion is cruel; it may be refined, but it is cruel. It strips from every Senator the element of independence and is liable to force every Senator into a disregard of his oath of office or else into oblivion.

Why, Mr. President, there are young, great, and ambitious men who seek admission to this body to make within these walls a career. They come here after they have reached the constitutional age of 30 years, and they look forward through the favor of confiding constituencies to many years of honor and usefulness in the Senate; but if, as the close of his first term is approaching, he must either abandon his convictions upon an important measure or, by being branded as a bolter, be defeated at home, in what a desperate and humiliating position is such a Senator placed!

Mr. President, I have heard the arguments used for this sort of coercion, and they do not appeal to my judgment. I have heard those who approved of it say that they have entered conventions in favor of particular candidates, and when others were selected have cheerfully acquiesced in the result; that they have gone into conventions and appealed for the adoption of certain declarations in party platforms and have failed of success, and yet they stood by the results; and because they are willing to submit to such disappointments members of the Senate should transfer their votes to either a majority or to two-thirds of their party friends. If that is the only argument, Mr. President, it brings the United States Senate down to the level of an ordinary political caucus.

Political caucuses and conventions, Mr. President, are voluntary assemblages. Men in them are not there acting under the obligations of an oath; they are not representing such constituencies as are Senators of this body. However they may be disappointed in their efforts for nominations or for platforms, they know or feel that their own party roof affords a better shelter than does the opposite political party, and, notwithstanding their disappointment, they remain under the rooftree.

There is no trouble in submission to the views of the majority of a convention upon matters of that kind. When disappointment occurs upon such occasions, they adopt the lesser of two evils. There is no choice but to remain away from the polls, or to adopt the ticket and the principles of the opposite political party, or to accept the platform and the candidates of their own party. Even then, Mr. President, I have no hesitation in saying that when a convention nominates a candidate that one considers unfit, either by reason of moral turpitude or by absolute incapacity, it is his duty to aid in the election of somebody else to the position for which he has been nominated.

I have always believed, Mr. President, that men in public office were more important than platforms. Platforms, upon too many occasions, have been altogether meaningless, while when you place a true man in office, whatever the platforms, he gives to the people of the country a good and acceptable administration, and he leaves his office with the country better off than when he entered it.

I have sometimes thought, Mr. President, that the Democratic party might learn valuable lessons from the Republican party—I suppose that is more treason, but I have said so before and I reiterate it now—not in its political principles, not in the governmental theories it represents, but in its dealing with the masses of the membership of the party.

I am told that the Republican Senators have no such thing as a caucus, and I am bound to accept that as true. Nor, Mr. President, do they have whole States bound and gagged in their national conventions under the unit rule. Under a wise rule, adopted by the machinery of their party, the different Congressional districts elect the two delegates to which each district is entitled in their national conventions and they enter the convention absolutely untrammeled by the oppression of the unit rule, every delegate, it may be, except perhaps the four representing the Senators—and of that I am not certain—having an unqualified right to vote as he pleases, and no majority can take from him that right.

Mr. President, the Democratic party has been out of power for many years. It has been in power but eight years since 1860. Will my Democratic friends stop and reflect that it is more than possible that it is through such arbitrary methods, through such an un-Democratic spirit in dealing with the masses of its party—it is possible that that is one reason for its banishment from control of the national councils?

The caucus, Mr. President, belongs in reality to voluntary political associations, such as conventions and gatherings in advance of conventions, to determine what measures shall be urged upon the convention to adopt, to determine how its views of the opposite political party shall be expressed, and what men it will be wise to nominate.

Mr. President, the resolutions that I introduced have particular reference to votes of independent Senators. I use that characterization whether the Senators are members of the one or the other political organization, or whether they stand aloof from both.

Until the adoption of the Constitution the States in the Congress were absolutely equal. Each State had the same number of votes, and the votes were cast as by the State. Such a system provided for by the Articles of Confederation soon made evident the utter imbecility of the government associated with it, and so the wise and the great men of the States in the early days succeeded in having a Constitutional Convention called for the adoption, if possible, of a new system, under which the thirteen independent States might live in amity and, as a nation, in perpetuity. When the convention met there were those of the body who insisted upon a system of government that was wholly national in its character. There were those who insisted upon a system of government that partook very largely of the old system under the Articles of Confederation. It was found that neither would do. The small States were jealous of their rights, of their independence, and their equality, and they were unwilling to surrender them. The outcome was the system under which we are now living, under which this country has so wonderfully grown and prospered.

It is a system that is part Federal and part national, with a House of Representatives that represents the nation, as the nation may be represented through the majority of its voters, and a Senate that is Federal. A Senate that represents the States and the independence, the dignity, and the equality of the States, a body that was to be selected by the legislatures of the several States, a body that is confined to but two Senators from each State, however great its territorial area or numerous its population, a body that through the method of the selection of its membership establishes a close union between the National Government and the State governments. We are members of the Federal branch of the National Legislature, the body that is intended to preserve the integrity, the equality, and the rights and the dignity of each one of the States.

Mr. President, I want to read from a reasonably late work just a sentence or two as to the nature of the Senate:

Although there has been no need of its interposition to protect the small from any encroachment by the larger States, until the civil war the Senate was more conspicuously the guardian of State rights in general. Their advocates maintained the position that the body was an assembly of ambassadors from sovereign States. During Washington's Administration North Carolina directed its Senators to execute a deed ceding land to the United States.

Senator Tazewell, of Virginia, declined Jackson's offer of a place in the Cabinet and said:

"Having been elected a Senator, I would as soon think of taking a place under George IV, if I was sent as minister to his court, as I would to take a place in the Cabinet."

Insistence has frequently been made upon the right of State legislatures to instruct their Senators in Congress.

What has the conduct of individual Senators shown to be their understanding of the relation of Senators to their several States? As suggested in Mr. Foster's work, it was maintained that the Senate consisted of a body of ambassadors from the sovereign States, and that the States had a right to instruct and recall, if they desired, their Senators.

John Quincy Adams resigned his seat in the Senate in 1808 after voting for the embargo in opposition to instructions from his legislature. Benton, in his Thirty Years in the Senate, recites that a Kentucky Senator in 1828 after arguing against what he denominated the tariff of abominations said:

As the organ of the State of Kentucky, I found myself bound to surrender my individual opinions and to express the opinions of my State.

John Tyler, in 1836, resigned his place in the Senate, because the legislature of Virginia instructed him to vote for the expunging resolutions, which he said he could not conscientiously do.

Mr. President, that view of the relation of the Senator to his State has been abandoned. The right of a State to instruct a Senator is no longer acknowledged. We all recall that the great and eloquent Lamar, of Mississippi, was instructed by the legislature of Mississippi as to his vote upon a matter then soon to be decided.

But the Senator from Mississippi said:

The State has no right to control me in this way. I am here as a legislator, acting under the sanction and the obligation of my oath of office; I am expected to vote as my judgment and conscience dictate; and that I will do, and I will not surrender that right even to the legislature of my State.

And to-day I doubt if there is a single Senator who would not follow the precedent set by Lamar, for I conceive it to be the right rule.

A Senator should not be so controlled, in view of his election for six years. The purpose of the framers of the Constitution being to secure, through a long term, freedom upon the part of Senators from sudden changes of public opinion—from the "craze," as some denominate it, which at times sweeps over a country and changes for the time popular desires. The Senate was created, so the fathers say, for the purpose of withstanding sudden revolutions of that kind, and that all legislation might ultimately reach the statute books after the scrutinizing and watchful and unbiased care that such a body as the Senate is expected to give to it.

Mr. President, the Constitution declares that this body shall consist of two Senators from each State, and that each Senator shall have one vote. Let me read what Mr. Story says, in a very brief sentence, upon the nature of that vote. He says, speaking of the Senate:

In the first place, the nature of the representation and vote in the Senate: Each State is entitled to two Senators, and each Senator is entitled to one vote. This, of course, involves in the very constitution of this branch of the legislature a perfect equality among all the States, without any reference to their respective size, population, wealth, or power.

Again, after referring to the House of Representatives:

In the former—

each State in its political capacity is represented upon a footing of perfect equality, like a congress of sovereigns or ambassadors, or like an assembly of peers.

Thus is the Senate constituted, Mr. President. Thus is the relationship of its membership the one to the other. It is so totally unlike the ordinary legislative assembly, the House of Representatives, or either branch of a State legislature that neither the public nor the Members of this body should ever lose sight of the fundamental differences. And yet it is sought to treat the votes of Senators as though the Senators were members of some voluntary popular political gathering.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the oath that Senators take, and the oath administered now is not what it always was. The first oath was provided under the statute of June 1, 1789, and the oath entire is as follows:

I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States.

There it commenced and there it ended. But in 1868, doubtless growing out of the civil war, the oath to be administered to Senators was amended so as to read as follows:

I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States—

The word "defend" is inserted—that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion—

Then note the concluding obligation—and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: So help me God.

I think I may refer with perfect propriety to the exceptions to the obligation of a caucus order of the Senatorial Democratic caucus. If I may not refer to the exceptions, I beg that some Senator will suggest its impropriety. I understand the exceptions are public, and that everybody knows them, and it is very much to the credit of the caucus that the exceptions have been made.

First, the caucus order does not bind when to do so would, in the opinion of the Senator, cause him to violate the Constitution. Second, it is not obligatory when he has in advance committed himself before the public. Third, it is not obligatory upon him when to vote as the caucus requests would cause him to violate the instructions of his State.

But, Mr. President, the second—when committed before caucus action—is of itself a condemnation of everything else. Why should it exempt a Senator simply because he has committed himself in the face of the public to the measure that is to be reached through caucus? I suppose it is because it would humiliate him in the eyes of the public. It is not the desire of the caucus to humiliate a Senator. Therefore, because he would seem to be inconsistent, because it would appear that he was driven by caucus action to vote against his convictions and his expressed desire, the caucus resolution shall not apply.

Ah, Mr. President, it does not provide, however, for the conscience of the Senator. It does not provide against humiliating himself in his own estimation. Because it would be a humiliaton to a Senator, after declaring to the public that he would vote one way, then, as a result of caucus action, to vote another. Because it would put him, or be liable to put him, in a false light before the public, he is exempted. But he himself should be a monitor of which he should stand in awe. He should have regard for his own convictions. He should feel that it was of more importance to him to know that he was true to himself than to feel simply that he was true to a word which might have been spoken hastily, but having spoken which he must not retract.

Therefore the very exceptions prove the extreme injustice and the indefensible character of this so-called "caucus action."

I believe, as I believe in the right of free speech, in the right of independent action in a conference of the members of political parties. I believe that they can not assemble too often for the purpose of evolving from what may be before the Senate the right, and, through appeals to the reason and the logical sense of Senators, lead them to the proper line of action. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred that would seem to be the necessary result.

We are here as Democrats or as Republicans. Our duty is not primarily to our party, but to the country; yet each desires the success and the welfare of his party. His future depends upon the welfare of his party. Then, unless there is some venal or corrupt purpose or operating influence, when his party colleagues meet in conference and the question is subjected to the test of common sense and duty and the welfare of the party, if the reason can be reached, the reason will be reached, and reason will prevail.

But, Mr. President, from what is said and from what appears in the public press, the caucus is not intended alone to reach the reason. It is coercive. Suggestions of White House Democrats, suggestions of Republicans surrendering to patronage, fly thick and fast when the least independence is shown. The caucus action is the equivalent of saying, "When we can not reach Senators through their reason, we will reach them through their fears." The caucus demand is the equivalent of declaring that "Senators are dishonest, and through motives and purposes and feelings that are degrading we can keep a Senator in line with us, regardless of his honor and the delicacy of the communication that should exist between members of this body."

I think caucuses of this kind are demoralizing to those upon whom they are intended to operate. In my judgment, when you find a Senator willing to submit his conscientious convictions upon a great public question to the behest of a caucus because to violate the rule of a caucus would weaken him at the polls and make his chances of return to the Senate fewer, you will find a man whose moral forces have been weakened, and who is more likely to be reached by venal influences than the man who in his every vote stands by his convictions of duty.

It is impossible—I will not say impossible, but it is highly improbable that a man mindful of the oath he takes, that he will faithfully perform the duties of the office upon which he is about to enter, with the memory of that oath in his mind, will say "though I have strong convictions about the necessity of this law or that, of this treaty or that, of the welfare of my country, I will abandon them all because a majority or two-thirds or any other number demand that I shall do so." The moral fiber of such an one is not very tough. It is liable to weaken from other questionable causes.

Mr. President, let me ask Senators why if you make an exception in the case of a caucus order in favor of that part of the oath which obligates a Senator to support and defend the Constitution you should not make an exception in favor of that part of the oath by which you have sworn faithfully to perform the duties of the office on which you are about to enter? What are the duties of the office of Senator? I suppose some of them are to attend the meetings of the Senate and to perform the duties connected with committees. Another duty, I suppose, is to conduct one's self in an orderly and decent manner. But above all, beyond all, is the obligation to vote upon every question according to the convictions of the Senator. If that is not one of the things that a Senator obligates himself to do when he solemnly swears that he will faithfully perform the duties of the office upon which he is about to enter, then there is no meaning to the oath; no situation can be imagined to which the test will apply.

Mr. President, just a few words upon the qualifications of Senators. A Senator must be 30 years of age. Why? Judge Story says:

> The age of Senators was fixed in the Constitution at first by a vote of seven States against four, and finally by a unanimous vote. Perhaps no one, in our day, is disposed to question the propriety of this limitation; and it is, therefore, useless to discuss a point which is so purely speculative. If counsels are to be wise, the ardor and impetuosity and confidence of youth must be chastened by the sober lessons of experience; and if knowledge and solid judgment and tried integrity are to be deemed indispensable qualifications for Senatorial service, it would be rashness to affirm that thirty years is too long a period for a due maturity and probation.

Whatever writer upon the Constitution you read, you will discover that "tried integrity" is one of the characteristics which it is expected will be displayed by Senators upon every occasion. Is there tried integrity when at the command of others a Senator votes against a measure when the Senator's judgment tells him he should vote for it?

Only yesterday—I was not in the Chamber at the time—some taunts passed backward and forward between the two sides of the Chamber. Perhaps I ought to use a milder word, but "taunts" will express it perhaps. Some reference was made, as I understand, by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to the influence of party caucuses in dealing with treaties. The reply was made from this side of the Chamber by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that members of the Senate on the other side were compelled to submit to a more coercive and powerful——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator does me too much honor. The words which he has quoted were uttered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I would have used a less diplomatic phrase, possibly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from South Carolina is right, but not as to the latter, because if the Senator from South Carolina is anything he is diplomatic. Sometimes people do not think so, but that is because of lack of that keen understanding and appreciation of the real meaning of the words which the Senator from South Carolina uses.

It was the Senator from Georgia. He replied in effect that those upon the opposite side of the Chamber were compelled to yield to more controlling influences than the caucus. I do not know whether that is right or not. I read in the public press about Senators and Representatives being sent for to go to the White House and of changes in attitude following as a result. I can not tell whether the change was the result of argument or of a desire to be kind and complacent. We know we can not safely depend upon rumors, and what occurs in the privacy of the White House and what has occurred in years gone by in the privacy of the White House can not be known. Therefore none of us can speak with certainty, using our conclusions as a foundation upon which to base censure or criticism.

But I do not hesitate to say, Mr. President, that the Senator or Member who surrenders his convictions upon a measure, whether treaty or proposed law, to the hope or promise of patronage, or the President who uses patronage for the purpose of winning members of Congress, whether Senators or Representatives, from their convictions are to be condemned, to say the least, and strongly condemned. The use of patronage to win over converts is nothing more nor less than the bribing of the convert, and the man, whether Senator or Representative, who, having reached a conclusion upon the propriety or the necessity of a measure or the defeat of any measure, will change his vote for patronage or for Presidential influence for reelection is in the same category with the man who sells his vote for money. It is, in the end, a mere question of personal gain.

I do not care whether a vote is sold that the legislator may be returned to the Senate or to the House or for offices to give to friends, the change has been brought about by immoral and indefensible methods, and morally the transaction is upon the same plane as is the securing of votes for venal considerations.

I will not occupy the time of the Senate longer than is necessary to read not the preambles, but the subdivisions of the resolution that I submitted to the Senate:

> Resolved, That such action—
> That is, the caucus action referred to—
> by the said or any other caucus is in plain violation of the spirit and intent of the Constitution of the United States.

The spirit and intent of the Constitution of the United States is that each State shall have two votes and that each Senator shall have one vote; and when a Senator surrenders that vote to a caucus decree he has abandoned his vote to other Senators, and to that extent he is violating the Constitution of the United States.

> Second. That for two-thirds or any other number of the Senators of any party to meet and declare that "it shall be the duty" of any Senator to vote upon any question other than as his own convictions impel him is a plain violation of the manifest intent and spirit of the Constitution all have sworn to uphold and defend.

Mr. President, who authorizes twenty, twenty-five, or thirty Senators to declare what the duty of any other Senator is in the matter of his votes? It can not be found in the Constitution; it can not be found in the laws. If the Senators represent their States, if their State speaks through them upon every question in which the voice of the Senate is recorded, then for any number of Senators, by intimidation or other improper methods, to lead him to cast a vote in conflict with his views is in clear violation of the spirit and intent of the Constitution.

> Third. That the "one vote" the Constitution declares each Senator shall have is his own vote and not the vote of any other or of any number of other Senators, and for a Senator to cast that "one vote" against his convictions of right and duty in the premises is to disfranchise his State in the Senate and to deprive it of the representation in that body the Constitution provides it shall have.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] said yesterday that there are some propositions so plain that to explain them only befogs them. The very statement of the proposition carries with it conviction as to its truth. Neither I nor any other Senator can surrender our convictions as to the right or the wrong of a measure to any number of other Senators without disfranchising our State pro tanto.

> Fourth. That when any number of Senators by combination or otherwise undertake through any species of coercion to induce other Senators to vote except as their judgments and consciences tell them, it is an invasion of the rights of a State to equal representation with other States in the Senate and is subversive of their rights to equal representation and the votes of its Senators in the Senate that the Constitution has provided for.

I will be gratified if some Senator will undertake to deny the proposition in the resolution I have just read. I would be pleased to see or to hear the authority upon which opposition to its statement is based—the logic, the code of morals, the line of duty that will lead a Senator in opposition to the statement made in that resolution.

Fifth. That the Senator who permits any body of other Senators to declare and define for him what his duty is in the matter of his vote in the Senate and who casts his vote in response to such interference, vote not as a Senator from his own State, but as a Senator from the other States, and he augments the power of the other States beyond that permitted by the Constitution and weakens and degrades the power of his own State in the Senate in violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

Sixth. That for any Senator to vote except as his judgment and sense of duty under his oath of office requires, is to degrade the high office of Senator and to assail the dignity and standing of the Senate of the United States—qualities possessed in such high degree by no other legislative body in the world.

Mr. President, I have spoken in a somewhat disconnected manner and in nowise satisfactory to myself. I will conclude by saying that I have no regrets for the course I have pursued and that I intend to continue to pursue. It is true that I may not be admitted to the councils of my party, so far as the Democratic Senators constitute the party; but, realizing that I am excluded, not by reason of moral turpitude or unseemly conduct, but because I am endeavoring to perform the duties of the high office of Senator as I swore to perform them and to maintain the dignity and the independence of the great office I have the honor to fill, I will meet and bear the excommunication with perfect equanimity, simply saying to my Democratic friends that I expect to meet them in the next national Democratic convention that I hope will nominate a candidate for the Presidency who will win by his character and his works the tremendous popular majority that was accorded to Theodore Roosevelt, and that when he enters upon the duties of his office it will be with a determination to be equally as brave, equally as conscientious, and equally as determined to stand by his guns until the battle of the people is won, in such things as I have seen fit to give full credit to President Roosevelt for.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, from the beginning to the end of his speech, and from the first line of its preamble to the last line of his resolution, the Senator from Colorado has proceeded upon a false hypothesis. He has assumed that his Democratic associates are seeking to deprive him of his right to cast his vote in the Senate according to his own judgment and conscience; and he thus betrays either an inability or an unwillingness to understand the difference between his relation to the Senate and his relation to his party. The Democratic caucus has simply and only defined his duty as a Democrat, and it is for him to determine how far his duty as a Senator requires him to disregard his duty as a Democrat.

Whether it was wise to make the Dominican treaty a party issue is another question, to which I may address myself after I have disposed of the Senator's charge that his party associates demand of him to violate his oath of office. That, sir, is a grave charge, because it necessarily involves the further charge that his Democratic associates have violated their oath of office. I believe I can make it plain that the caucus acted wisely in its resolution, and I know that I can demonstrate to the mind of any man who thinks into things instead of around things that we have infringed no constitutional right of the Senator.

The caucus is almost as old as the Congress, and the political convention, beginning with the precinct primary and culminating at the national assembly of a party, is older than either the Senator from Colorado or myself.

And yet this wonderful Constitution which he invokes, this instrument which is so marvelous in the wisdom and foresight with which it contemplated and provided for all contingencies, does not seem to have supposed that political parties would exist. It provides for the appointment of electors by the several States; and, as singular as it may seem to us in this day, the reason assigned in the convention which framed it for requiring these electors to convene on the same day in their several States was to prevent any conference or previous understanding amongst them. It will be recalled by all familiar with the history of the time that it was that very failure to previously confer which resulted in the unfortunate tie vote between Mr. Jefferson and Aaron Burr; and the Congress found itself compelled to propose an amendment in order to provide against the recurrence of another circumstance like that. The Senator from Colorado and myself continually in our States participate in the nomination and election of electors, who would be crucified in full view of all the public if they dared to cast their vote according to their own judgment, and they are compelled to cast it according to their party's decree.

The Senator from Colorado himself owes his seat in this body to the result of a binding caucus rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. A friend has just handed me an account of the proceedings when the Senator from Colorado was chosen a member of this body. I have not myself had an opportunity to verify the statements, but as they have been prepared by one whose accuracy I have always found reliable I have no doubt that they are correct; and if not, the Senator from Colorado is privileged to interrupt and correct me.

These notes recite that "on January 9, 1901, the Hon. Charles S. Thomas, a candidate for United States Senator from the State of Colorado, addressed a letter to the Hon. T. M. PATTERSON, also a candidate for United States Senator, and suggested that a caucus be called to meet at 8 p. m., January 14, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for United States Senator to be voted for in the Colorado legislature on January 15. Mr. PATTERSON replied that the caucus should be called for the Saturday previous, in order that the caucus might be certain to name a candidate by the following Tuesday, when balloting for a United States Senator would begin. The caucus was held on Monday evening, January 14, and Mr. PATTERSON was nominated." Will the Senator from Colorado contend——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. Lest there should be some misinterpretation of my silence, I want to say that that is a thoroughly accurate account.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought so, for I think it came from one of the Senator's own papers. [Laughter.]

I call on the Senator from Colorado to tell the Senate and the country whether he thinks it is more incumbent upon a Senator in Congress to cast his vote untrammeled by a caucus than it was upon a member of the Colorado legislature.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. Would the Senator prefer that I should not interrupt him? I do not want to do so. I would prefer that his speech should continue uninterrupted, and that my silence shall only be accepted as a courtesy that by the rule is due from one Senator to another, with the assurance that if I think it will require any answer I will answer the Senator later. I would rather it would be that way, Mr. President.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator is at liberty to interrupt me at any time. I shall try—indeed, I will not only try, I will be certain—to make respectful replies to any interruption the Senator sees fit to make.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. And if it would not trouble the Senator, since he has interrupted me, I would ask him if he thinks a different rule ought to apply to a member of the legislature of Colorado from that which applies to a Senator in the Congress of the United States?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, since I am directly requested to reply to that, I will take great pleasure in doing so. Without any question, where it is merely the selection of a candidate to fill the office of Senator or to fill a legislative office, whether great or small, when they enter the caucus it is the mere exercise of judgment upon the part of the members of the legislature whether one man or another will better perform the duties of the office, or, if not that, that his personal preferences are for one man over another. But the caucus having spoken, he violates no oath when he says, "I will submit to the caucus in the selection of a candidate for any office, great or small."

There is no oath operating upon a member of the legislature in that regard. If the members of a legislature or members of the Senate shall meet for the purpose of determining who shall fill the offices, the majority on the one side or the other having determined to submit to the result can not in any wise affect the obligations of a Senator under his oath of office. If the Senator can not see the difference it is not because there is no difference, for I can readily see the difference. If the Senator had been in during all my speech I think he would have clearly understood the difference that I sought to make between the two.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I was in, and I left the Chamber only once, and for less than four minutes, to receive a message from the hospital.

I do perceive a difference; but it does not lie in the direction indicated by the Senator from Colorado. He impressed upon us in the course of his speech that men are more important than platforms. I accept that view. We are in the habit of describing this as a Government of laws rather than a Government of men. In a sense that is happily true. This is a Government where we are governed by fixed rules of law, rather than by the caprice of individuals; and yet it must not be forgotten that the laws must first be made by men, and then must be executed by men. I am rather inclined to subscribe to the doctrine of the Senator from Colorado that the candidate is more important than the platform; but is that not an argument against binding men to abide by caucus action in electing a Senator and then refusing to be bound by a caucus decision in respect to a measure?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, whenever a question is put directly to me I feel that I have a right to answer; otherwise I will not.

The reason to my mind is perfectly plain. As a rule candidates are respectable men; they are men of character; they belong to the same political organization; and if they have a respectable amount of strength in their own party, it is fair to presume that they will attempt at least to perform the duties of their office faithfully. Under those circumstances, since in a certain sense a majority must always rule in this country in the selection of men for office, there is no conflict whatever between the duty of the man and his action. But, Mr. President, that is simply a voluntary act. If the caucus or the convention shall nominate an unfit man, a dishonest man, a corrupt man, who will say that it is not the duty of the member of the caucus or the party to repudiate him without hesitation? It is a matter that is wholly voluntary and is not determined by the obligations of an oath or the peculiar relations that members of this body bear to the State that has sent them here.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, without having had the time to examine the constitution of Colorado or the oath of office which the members of its legislature take, I imagine that they, as we do here, take an oath to support the constitution and to faithfully discharge their duties. Now, one duty of a member of the legislature of Colorado is to choose a United States Senator at certain intervals. Therefore the members of the Colorado legislature in choosing a Senator were bound by an oath to choose him according, as the Senator would argue, to their preferences and not to the decision of a caucus.

Mr. President, I do not myself have much patience with the argument that lays particular stress upon an oath, because my judgment is that a man who will violate his duty is, when the temptation becomes great enough, certain to violate his oath; and whether the members of the Colorado legislature take a specific oath to faithfully perform their duty or not, it remains that they had a duty to perform in the election of a Senator, and they performed it according to the decision of a caucus when they elected the Senator to this body.

There is scarcely a Senator in this Chamber, except those of us from Southern States, where the matter is determined by a popular vote at a primary election, who does not owe his seat in this body to the binding action of a caucus; and repeating with emphasis the statement of the Senator from Colorado, that the man is more important than the measure, I take it that no more important function is performed by a member of the State legislature than the election of an United States Senator. Yet if the reasoning of the Senator from Colorado is to be accepted, every Senator in this body who holds his place as the result of a caucus decision is a beneficiary of conduct on the part of those by whom he was chosen which can hardly be characterized in parliamentary language.

Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado did not correctly state the exceptions under which the Democratic caucus can bind its members. Correctly he says it can not bind a Senator to vote against his oath to obey the Constitution; correctly he says it can not bind a Senator against the instructions of his people; but incorrectly he states the third exception to be where a Senator has committed himself before the public; and the mistake of the Senator inevitably brings the whole argument which he built upon it toppling to the ground. That third exception is not that he has committed himself before the public, and thus would be embarrassed by a question of personal consistency. That third exception is where prior to his election he has pledged himself to his people, and that proceeds upon what to my mind is the sound theory that no caucus has a right to require any Senator to break his faith with his constituents.

Saving the right of a Democratic Senator to respect the Constitution; saving the right of a Democratic Senator to keep the commandment of his people; saving the right of a Democratic Senator to preserve inviolate the pledge he made and upon which he secured his election, it is a small concession to the principle of party organization to then require that all shall perform their duty as a majority of two-thirds may define it. The Senator from Colorado has never been in a political assembly where that or a stricter rule did not prevail; and he can do in respect to a Democratic caucus as he does in respect to a national Democratic convention whenever it takes action which his judgment and his conscience can not approve. He can withdraw from it; and his own experience disproves his assertion that it is a cruel outrage to compel him to do so and thus incur defeat, because in less than ten years after he walked out of a national Democratic convention he stood at that desk and took the oath of office as a Democratic Senator, representing the same people in whose behalf he had defied the duly constituted authority of his party.

Whenever a Senator's conscience will not permit him to cast his vote according to the decision of a caucus, he must defy the caucus just as he must defy a national convention or just as he would defy a State convention, and leave the consequences to time and to his people. The Senator from Colorado pays a poor compliment to his associates on both sides of the Chamber when he insinuates that a Senator would weigh his duty against the danger of defeat. I do them all, the Senator from Colorado included, the honor to believe that no Senator here would vote for any measure involving a serious injury to his country in order to insure his reelection to this Senate for a hundred years, God sparing his life that long.

The Senator from Colorado must know that the Democratic party is as much responsible for him as he is for it. The Senator must know that when he proclaims a false doctrine or casts a wrong vote in the Senate the Democratic party is arraigned before the country. The Senator must know that when he fervently eulogizes a Republican President the Democratic party in the country is made to suffer—not to suffer from the eulogy, so far as that might be deserved, but to suffer from his imputation that we are assailing the President without sufficient reason and purely from partisan motives.

I wonder that the Senator did not have something to say about the President's oath of office when they wrote him that letter that a Methodist parson must hold a particular place. In the very oath to which he turned in the Constitution for an argument against us it is provided that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States, and yet the Senator says that the President answered his letter by saying that a particular place belonged to the Methodists and that no Presbyterian could hope to secure it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was a little inaccurate in my statement. The answer did not come from the President. I was assuming too much familiarity with the President.

Mr. BAILEY. It came from his secretary, did it?

Mr. PATTERSON. It came from his secretary, who spoke for him. I trust there will be no assumption that that would make the slightest particle of difference as to the meaning or effect of a thing of that kind. I simply state that so that I may be historically correct, and simple justice requires that that should be done. I would scorn to take advantage of a quip of that kind, but the truth ought to be stated as it is.

Mr. BAILEY. The President ought to get him a Secretary who would keep the oath against establishing religious discriminations, because the Constitution provides that there shall be no religious test. I knew they had established certain political discriminations at the White House, but I did not know that they had divided the places among the various religious denominations. [Laughter.] Perhaps that explains how it was that they had so many Christian votes at the last election for this strenuous and warlike President, whose gospel is not the gospel of peace so much as it is the gospel of a strenuous life. He is the only President, living or dead, who ever proclaimed it as his philosophy that "the only life is a life of strife," and yet the Christians supported him!

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think it is only due to me to say that the President in apportioning chaplains—if that is done; I do not know—among the different regiments is attempting to be nonsectarian by selecting ministers of the different denominations, and that in all probability he is doing just precisely what has been done in the White House since we have had Presidents and since we have had armies. I hardly think, although the Senator from Texas always puts matters in a very striking light, that his is a fair argument, and it does not meet either the situation or the real logic of the case.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the alacrity with which the Senator from Colorado rushes to the defense of the President of the United States shows that he needs the saving grace of a caucus resolution to keep him within the Democratic lines. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the galleries that under the rules of the Senate the galleries are not permitted to engage in demonstrations. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, there is no Senator in this body, and I doubt if there is any citizen of this country, who is more tenacious of his own opinion than I am; and yet, without any compromise of my self-respect, and without any sacrifice of my independence, over and again I have submitted to the decision of a majority of my party as to what candidate I should support and what platform he should stand upon. I expect to do that to the end, or until my party nominates such a man or promulgates such a platform that my duty as a citizen will not permit me to submit, and then I shall withdraw from the party, but in withdrawing I shall not try to sow the seeds of disorganization there by denying their authority and jurisdiction to nominate a candidate and adopt a platform.

I believe, as the Senator from Colorado appears not to believe, in the right of the people to instruct a Senator. We are not here to represent ourselves; we are here to represent our States, and whenever I can not honestly and conscientiously voice the sentiments of the people whose commission I hold I will resign my seat in this body. I will not defy them; I will not keep their office and flaunt their convictions, but whenever I can not obey their will and preserve my self-respect I will take their commission back and lay it down unsullied at their feet and allow them to choose a Senator who can represent them without misrepresenting himself.

I believe, too, in the inviolability of the pledge which any candidate for an office makes to his people. While the Senator rejects one and describes the other as an abandoned doctrine, he has only the right to speak for himself in that regard. It is true that an illustrious Senator, representing the State in which I had the good fortune to be born, denied the right of the legislature to instruct him upon a great question. The Senator from Colorado, however, is as badly mistaken about his dates as he is about his principle. Senator Lamar did not disobey an instruction on the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law. He was at that time a justice upon the Supreme Bench, interpreting the laws, not making them. It was, as I recall, in 1878, when he disobeyed the instruction of the Mississippi legislature, and that episode affords another conspicuous and abundant proof that a brave and upright man may dare to do many things without being driven from the service of his country.

There never was an hour in the history of Mississippi when her people agreed with Senator Lamar upon the silver question. As a boy I remember his magnificent and triumphant march through that State delivering a speech which had not been equaled since the days of Davis and Foote and Poindexter and their mighty comrades, and yet through that three hours of eloquent speech he did not once voice the sentiments of his people upon that particular question, nor did they accept his view upon the right of the people to instruct; but, though differing from him both upon the main and upon the incidental question, they returned him without opposition to the Senate. Not only so, but they sent as his successor here the knightly and splendid Walthall, who was his bosom friend, but who, exercising the right of a friend, himself differed with the great Lamar upon the silver question.

If my time and the patience of the Senate permitted, I could recall many instances where Senators have asserted their independence on a great occasion or with respect to a great question, and their people have only increased the esteem in which they held them. Let a Senator be right, let him be sure that it is a matter of his conscience, and he can absent himself from the caucus of any party, and, appealing to the free suffrages of his own people, he will find a vindication. But the trouble is that Senators want the privilege of differing from the caucus upon questions and on occasions which they are not willing to submit to their people, and therein lies the cruel injustice against which the Senator from Colorado complains.

Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado has rather contracted the habit of eulogizing the President of the United States. He did so the other day and he does so again to-day. I want to read to the Senator what the President of the United States says about the Democratic party upon this very question of a lack of discipline. The Senator has read it before; he may have prayed over it. I did not. I had to pray to get forgiveness for what I said about it after I first read it. [Laughter.] There never was in the history of the United States such a remarkable document as this penned by any man in a high position. He says, in effect, that if the Democrats believe what they say, they are fools; and if they do not believe it, they are liars. In the second paragraph of this remarkable letter of acceptance the President taunts the Senator and our entire party with a charge of infirm and vacillating purpose. He says:

> It is difficult to find out from the utterances of our opponents what are the real issues upon which they propose to wage this campaign. It is not unfair to say that, having abandoned most of the principles upon which they have insisted during the last eight years, they now seem at a loss, both as to what it is that they really believe and as to how firmly they shall assert their belief in anything. In fact, it is doubtful if they venture resolutely to press a single issue; as soon as they raise one they shrink from it and seek to explain it away. Such an attitude is the probably inevitable result of the effort to improvise convictions; for when thus improvised, it is natural that they should be held in a tentative manner.

Two paragraphs from that the President admonishes the country that it can expect nothing from "a party whose members are radically at variance on most vital issues;" and he reads us a lesson on the value of united action. These are his words:

> A party whose members are radically at variance on most vital issues, and if united at all are only united on issues where their attitude threatens widespread disaster to the whole country, can not be trusted to govern in any matter.

A divided party very naturally receives, as I am more than half inclined to believe it deserves, the contempt of the President. Again he says, speaking of our platform:

> The language of the platform indicated a radical change of policy; the later utterances indicated a continuance of the present policy. But this caused trouble in their own ranks; and in a still later, although less formal, utterance the self-government promise was recanted, and independence at some future time was promised in its place. They have occupied three entirely different positions within fifty days. Which is the promise they really intend to keep? They do not know their own minds, and no one can tell how long they would keep of the same mind should they by any chance come to a working agreement among themselves.

That is what the President of the United States thinks about the party of the Senator from Colorado; and yet the Senator from Colorado likens the present President of the United States to a Democratic patron saint like Andrew Jackson. I doubt if the President considers it very much of a compliment to be described as like Andrew Jackson. I want to read to the Senator from Colorado what the President thinks about Andrew Jackson, and then let the President infer from it what the Senator from Colorado thinks about him. [Laughter.]

Referring in his "Life of Benton" to the election of Jackson in 1828, the President says:

> The change was a great one; it was not a change of the policy under which the Government was managed, as in Jefferson's triumph, but of the men who controlled it. The two great Democratic victories had little in common—

He means the victory under Jefferson in 1800 and the victory under Jackson in 1828—> almost as little as had the two great leaders—

Jackson and Jefferson—

> under whose auspices they were respectively won, and few men were ever more unlike than the scholarly, timid, and shifty doctrinaire—

That is the way he describes Thomas Jefferson—> who supplanted the elder Adams, and the ignorant, headstrong, and straightforward soldier who was victor over the younger.

The Senator from Colorado says that the President of the United States is like Andrew Jackson. The President of the United States says Andrew Jackson was ignorant and headstrong. [Laughter.] I leave him to settle with his friend at the White House whether he pays him a compliment or not. [Laughter.] But that is not all that the President of the United States said about the triumph of Andrew Jackson. I beg the Senator from Colorado to listen to this:

> That the change was the deliberate choice of the great mass of the people, and that it was one for the worse, was then, and has been ever since, the opinion of most thinking men. Certainly the public service then took its first and greatest step in the downward career of progressive debasement and deterioration, which has only been checked in our own days.

He means that it was checked by the election of a Republican President. This is the picture he draws of Andrew Jackson. Let the Senator from Colorado look on the picture which he draws of the President, in which he likens him to Jackson, and then see how much it resembles the picture which the President himself has drawn of Andrew Jackson.

Let us go one step further. Take the great policy which the Senator from Colorado so highly eulogizes and likens so closely to the policy of Jackson—the President's struggle against the money power. What did the President think of Jackson's struggle against the money power? But before I come to that I believe I will complete this comparison. The President says a great historian compared Wellington to Washington, but he says the comparison ought to have been of Wellington with Jackson, and, remembering that other historians shall come after the President, I want to preserve the full portrait for future comparison.

A very charming English historian of our day—has compared Wellington with Washington; it would have been far juster to have compared him with Andrew Jackson. Both were men of strong, narrow minds and bitter prejudices, with few statesmanlike qualities.

That is Justin McCarthy—

The President of the United States says Jackson was headstrong and narrow-minded, with bitter prejudices and few statesmanlike qualities. The Senator from Colorado says the President is like Andrew Jackson. [Laughter.]

The President has also recorded in a most enduring form his opinion of Jackson's struggle against the bank, and here it is:

The bank memorialized Congress at once, and the anti-Administration majority in the Senate forthwith took up the quarrel. They first rejected Jackson's nominations for bank directors, and then refused to confirm Taney himself. Two years later Jackson made the latter Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, in which position he lived to do even more mischief than he had time or opportunity to accomplish as Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senator from Colorado is too well informed as to the history of his country to need me to remind him that Taney's signal service to Jackson as Secretary of the Treasury was to complete his triumph over that bank by removing the public moneys; and yet the President of the United States says that Taney did all the mischief there that time and opportunity permitted.

Mr. President, if the sainted dead were permitted to view the affairs of this world, and if the passions which they felt in life are not subdued and chastened in that better world, how the mighty spirit of Jackson would rage against being described as like the man who describes him as a narrow and ignorant soldier, without the qualifications of a statesman. From his place amidst the seats of the mighty how he would scorn those who profess to be his disciples and who, claiming allegiance to the principles which he taught and for which he struggled, yet constantly eulogize and exalt the men who have defamed his memory and denounced his work.

In all the long line of illustrious men who have occupied that high station, not one of them has ever been so generously treated by his political opponents as has the present President of the United States. Not only have his adversaries applauded him when he was right, but they have gone out of their way to declare over and over again that he was right when one declaration was sufficient. In his day Washington was assailed with a bitterness which no man in the Senate would employ against the present President. He was denounced as the "stepfather of his country," and assailed with such violence of speech that in the anguish of his great soul he cried out that he would rather be in his grave than in the Presidency.

Following him came Adams, who suffered even a bitterer criticism; and Jefferson was aspersed and villified beyond description. The President's description of him as a timid and shifty doctrinaire is not the worst epithet that the President has used with reference to Thomas Jefferson; and it is gentle praise compared with some of the attacks upon him in that day. Even during the era of good feeling Monroe was attacked with more severity than the present President of the United States has yet encountered; and Jackson was so bitterly maligned and assailed that madmen met him at the entrance of the Capitol and sought his life. And yet, Mr. President, no President who has ever gone before him has given such provocation for bitter speech against him as the present President of the United States. If I were to stand here in my place and say of him what he has said not only of one, but of every predecessor in his great office who was chosen by a Democratic majority, I would be rebuked no less by my friends on this side than by my opponents on the other side of this Senate Chamber.

The President's friends seem to think that an attack upon one policy is inspired by a secret animus against all his policies. I do not hold the President responsible for all that is printed in the newspapers; perhaps his secretary is sometimes responsible; but within the last month in great headlines printed in a morning paper there was a column of insinuation that whenever we attack the President's foreign policy or any other policy we are actuated by a secret desire to defeat his rate legislation. We have no patent on that policy. If it pleases the President's friends to describe it as his, I shall offer no objection. So that we can put it on the statute book, it does not concern me who votes to put it there, or whose signature entitles it to go there. I am sure, however, that it would be a more effective bill if there were a Democratic President in the White House to sign it. But I do not doubt that when it is enacted it will be an improvement upon the present law, and I rejoice that the President has favored it.

I am free to say that if it had not been for the President's attitude with reference to this rate legislation, I do not believe that we could get a debate upon it in the Senate, or if we did, it would be in one of those perfunctory speeches which nobody hears while it is being delivered and nobody reads after it has been printed. The President's own party did not believe in it. I assume that they did not believe in it because they did not declare in favor of it. We put it in our platform. They did not put it in theirs. We went to the country, and instead of capturing the country the country seems to have captured us; and they strive to bind us prisoners to the Republican chariot wheels throughout this whole Administration.

I do not complain that the President adopts a policy for which we are entitled to the credit of its authors, even if we are compelled to give him the credit as its finisher. But I have a right to comment upon the fact that it has seldom happened in the political history of this country that one party goes to the country demanding a change, while another party goes to the country "standing pat"—I do not know just exactly what that expression means, but I am told that it is borrowed from a game of chance, as is that other expression about which we hear so much—a "square deal." I am told that both are the vernacular of the gaming table. Think of it! This great Republican party, which for so many years boasted of its great moral ideas, now appealing to the people of this country in the common language of a gambling room! One party goes to the country standing pat against another party which demands a change; the country decides in favor of the party that stood pat, and then the President chosen by that stand-pat party proposes to deal at once. A square deal, it is true, but the party in power said, "We stand pat;" and I am informed by gentlemen who are familiar with the game that this expression means that there is to be no further deal—square or otherwise.

The President takes a well-considered and important plank out of the platform of the opposition party, and calls on his party to make it into a law; and they set the Senator from Colorado an example of party loyalty and party obedience in following his command. When it passes the House of Representatives there will not be ten Republican votes cast against it, and most of those who vote that way will then pronounce the doxology on their public life.

Here it will be somewhat different, I take it. I see evidences of an independence here which I will not say does not exist in the other branch of Congress, because that would be unparliamentary, however true it might be. I see evidences of opposition, but let the Senator from Colorado remember what I say: The big stick will be waved in such a fashion that a majority of the Senators on the other side will support this policy which the President has borrowed from the Democratic platform. I applaud the President for what he has said and done on the rate question, but that is no reason why I should applaud him for all else that he does and says.

The Senator from Colorado tells the Senate of a private conversation that he had with the President, and declares that in his judgment the President had usurped the function of Congress to pass laws applying to certain forest reservations. He says he had a spirited debate with the President about it. Republican Senators understand what a spirited debate with the President means, and most of us understand what a spirited debate with the Senator from Colorado means. I wish I could have heard it. I would like to hear the arguments that could convince the Senator from Colorado that a President who usurps the legislative powers of Congress is like Andrew Jackson. It must have been a most persuasive argument. It had to be persuasive. The Senator from Colorado is not susceptible to the knockdown kind, because that kind arouses his fighting qualities. I have sometimes before this suspected that while the President could roar like a lion when he thought that was best, he could also coo like a dove when that was best. He applies the sweet tongue to us, while he waves the big stick over my friends on the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended, because it did not require that much should be said, and I have said it in a desultory and disconnected way, because for three days I have stood by the bedside of a very sick child, and only that the great shadow passed away this morning am I able to be here at all this afternoon. I felt, however, that it was my duty to come, if come I could, because I had prepared and I had introduced the resolution which the Senator from Colorado denounces as an invasion of his rights as a Senator. I hope that a discussion of this question will bring the country to understand—and if the country once addresses itself to a consideration of the question it will understand—that the power of a party caucus ends when it defines the duty of a party man; that no caucus can, that no caucus ought, that no caucus ever will, bind an American Senator to cast a vote which he believes destructive to his country's honor or his country's glory or her people's highest interests.

When such questions arise, a man must be a patriot rather than a partisan. But on questions of lesser moment a party may not only advise but firmly may enforce its advice, and in either case it can do the country harm, whatever effect it may have upon the individual Senator. If the Senator is the right kind and his conscience revolts against the party command, he obeys his conscience and defies his party. If the Senator is not the right kind, it is a God's blessing that we have somebody here to vote him, and the pity is that we can not vote him on all occasions rather than upon those rare ones when the party acts as a unit.

I am a partisan myself, but I must be permitted to believe that my partisanship had its origin in my patriotism. I am a partisan because I believe the glory and welfare of my country are bound up in the success of the principles of the Democratic party; and I freely declare my belief that the Senators on the other side are actuated by the same conviction. I have heard men say they are Democrats because they were born in that political faith, and that other men are Republicans because they were so born. I have no doubt that this accurately describes a certain class of men, but it can never describe the kind of a man who is fit to sit in the Senate of the United States as the ambassador from a great American Commonwealth. Those who come here are and ought to be controlled by a devotion to certain principles, and they unite ourselves with a given party because they believe that party best calculated to promote the growth, the permanence, and the success of those principles.

Let us once grant this, and what follows? As unerringly as night follows the day, it must follow that we recognize the right of the majority to prescribe the party conduct which is to perpetuate those principles. It will never happen that a party will take any position upon which every member of it will agree, but, agreeing in the main, they must consent to waive the immaterial or infrequent differences in order to promote the accomplishment of a common and important end.

That applies not only to political parties; it applies to every kind of an organization. The right of the majority to rule is not a despotism. Jefferson declared it to be the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force. The rule of the majority is not only the vital principle of republics, but it is the vital principle of every organization of every kind.

Take your corporate institutions organized for profit. So long as they pursue the objects of their charter the majority must rule. When the majority depart from the charter purpose, the member is not put to the necessity of withdrawing because he has an investment there. He simply resorts to the courts, and they restrain the majority from abandoning the purpose of the incorporation.

Take the great religious denominations of the country. Does a man forfeit his right to worship God, to believe in Christ and read the Scriptures, simply because, belonging to the Methodist Church, he denies one of its tenets and is expelled? The church expels a man who does not agree with it upon important matters of doctrine, but he can still serve and worship God in his own way. I believe all churches expel the unorthodox except the hard-shell Baptist Church, and it simply withdraws from the erring brother.

There is no kind of an organization under this flag to-day where the right of the majority to rule is not recognized and enforced. I subscribe to it; I submit to it cheerfully; and I only reserve the right, whenever I believe it departs so essentially from its fundamental principles that I can no longer cooperate with it, of doing as the Senator from Colorado has done more than once—I want the privilege of defying its decision.

The Senator from Colorado says he bolted the Democratic national convention of 1892. I accord him that right. I honor him for doing so, if he thought his duty to his country required it. The Senator from Colorado, however, does not reserve the assertion of his independence for great occasions, because, unless I am in error, within the last two years the Senator has denied the right of his party to bind him by a local municipal nomination.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Texas is entirely right; I did. The local Democratic organization of Denver is simply the tool of the public-utility corporations of Denver, and at the election two years ago the head of the utility corporations organized a Democratic city convention and then organized a Republican city convention. He then blended the Democratic and the Republican ticket, every one of the nominees pledged to vote to continue their masters in power and in control and ownership of the great franchises of Denver, which are about to expire. The Democratic organization of Denver was but the tool of these great municipal corporations; and everybody knows that the municipal corporations of the cities of the United States are the curse of their politics and robbers of the people.

Without any hesitation, Mr. President, I bolted. I refused to support a ticket such as that, and I did my best to elect another ticket, and that other ticket was elected by five or six thousand majority. But the heads of these corporations organized their raids upon the ballot boxes, and they were the instrumentalities of those stupendous frauds committed upon the ballot boxes that made the city notorious. They committed them to place in power their tools, that when the time comes they may rob the city of Denver of these great franchises, worth, on a low estimate $50,000,000. I stood in opposition to it, and I expect to remain in opposition to all such schemes of plunder.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it may be that the majority of the Democrats in Denver are rascals, but I can not believe it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I repudiate the insult to the Democrats of Denver. The majority, 90 per cent of the Democrats of Denver, are as conscientious and honest as ever gave honor to a city; but the money of these great corporations has secured control of the local committees, and the local committees, obeying the behest of their master, packed primaries, packed conventions, and nominated his tools for the venal purpose that he had in mind.

Mr. BAILEY. From the Senator's statement it appears that 90 per cent of the Democrats of Denver are honest and 10 per cent of them are rascals. In view of the fact that the 10 per cent of rascals beat the 90 per cent of honest men, the 90 per cent must be fools. For my part I would about as soon deal with a rascal as a fool. There is some hope of reforming a rascal by bringing him to believe it is best to be honest, but there is no remedy for a fool that I have ever been able to discover. [Laughter.]

But the Senator from Colorado must not be offended when I say that as he has walked out of so many Democratic conventions, he was following a habit rather than a principle of conduct when he walked out of the Democratic caucus last Saturday.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator from Texas that I am not in the least offended; not in the least. I have received the ukase of the caucus, or whatever it may be termed, in a perfectly equable frame of mind.

Mr. BAILEY. As indicated by these resolutions.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think those resolutions indicate a pretty clear conception of what the rights and duties of a Senator are, and those rights and duties can not be swept aside by likening them to the duties of members of a Democratic or Republican political caucus, dealing either with platforms or nominees.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it may be a defect in my education, but I have always believed that the humblest man in America had upon him the same obligations to do his duty at the general election that a Senator in the Congress of the United States has to do his duty here. There may be something that elevates a man above the great mass of humanity when he is elected to the Senate. Some of them seem to think so. I have read in a very excellent play by an immortal author of the man who climbs—

> But when he once attains the upmost round
> He then unto the ladder turns his back,
> Looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees
> By which he did ascend.

But as for my part, the people who sent me to the Senate have exactly the same rights, duties, and responsibilities at home as I have here, and if the American citizen in the primary of his own party and at the general election does not do his duty, it is of small consequence how we do ours. Concede that we are the head—they are the heart and blood. Corupt and stifle that, and the Senate becomes a matter of no national consequence. The attempt to differentiate the duty of a Senator from the duty of a constituent when it comes to deciding the great affairs of this Republic will not be accepted by the American people.

I am tempted before I close to read one thing more that the Senator said when he was elected to the Senate, showing then that this new light had not broken in upon his brain.

When I take my place in the Senate I will unite my efforts with the Democratic members and enter their—

Not conferences—

their caucuses.

The Senator says that a caucus is purely a voluntary matter; that it has no place in the Senate is his inference. Yet he thought it had when he accepted the election at the hands of a legislature controlled by a caucus rule. That is not all the good reading——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator let me finish this, and he can reply to both at once?

Mr. PATTERSON. All right.

Mr. BAILEY (reading):

I believe the fight for them can be most successfully made within the Democratic ranks. It must be made within the caucuses, in the primaries, and the conventions of the party. Those friends who are outside of them are outside of the fortifications built to defend these principles, and are but helpless lookers on while the struggle in which all Americans are so vitally interested may be irretrievably lost.

Excellent doctrine.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are those the words of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. Those are from the same account, for the accuracy of which the Senator from Colorado has kindly vouched.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not know that I could use such forceful and excellent language.

Mr. BAILEY. It may be that the reporter did it for you. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Possibly; but I did not know that I could express myself in such strong and excellent and forceful language. I will not gainsay it, and I would not hesitate to reiterate the same thing to-morrow were I addressing my constituency. I was elected by a combination of Populist, Silver Republican, and Democratic votes, under no false colors. Before the election—and it was before the election I made the speech—I told them plainly where I was going, for I like to deal frankly with all who are dealing with me. I never aim or intend to sail under false colors. But, Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I will say that there is no Senator in this body who will more heartily indorse that statement with reference to him than I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. But, Mr. President, there are caucuses and caucuses. A caucus is but another name for a conference, and a conference may be but another name for a caucus. I know what I had in mind, and I know what the people I was addressing had in mind; that I would enter the Democratic caucus, among other things, for the organization of the Senate, for consultation upon every question of importance, for the purpose of bringing a coordination of action, if it were possible, to do anything and everything that might properly and legitimately be done for the purpose of securing unity of action on great party measures.

Again the Senator from Texas persists in ignoring what I attempted to say in the remarks I made this morning—that when it comes to legislation, when it comes to the enactment of great laws that embrace the welfare of this country—and it may be the welfare of other countries—each individual Senator must vote according to his convictions; and when the caucus undertakes to control, forbid, punish, excommunicate, or otherwise, any Senator for refusing to sink his own convictions and surrender them to others the caucus is overstepping its bounds and its authority.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I was misled into construing these declarations as I did rather than as the Senator from Colorado now explains them, because I remembered that the Senator from Colorado was in the Democratic caucus when we adopted this rule which provides for binding Senators upon a two-thirds vote of the caucus.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask the Senator to what caucus he refers?

Mr. BAILEY. You were present at the caucus about two years ago when it adopted as its rule of action the very resolution under which we acted when we adopted the resolution which you have recited and assailed. In other words, you were there when the caucus adopted the resolution providing that whenever two-thirds of the caucus should so order all Senators should be bound, except in the three cases that you have enumerated.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, there is some mistake about that, for I have always been opposed to attempting to coerce Senators into voting against their convictions of duty. I recall very well—and I did not suppose that the Senator would enter into the proceedings of caucuses——

Mr. BAILEY. You brought them here yourself.

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not.

Mr. BAILEY. You brought the resolution here.

Mr. PATTERSON. I only brought that which was made public and which was given to the public by officers of the caucus. I never said one word about what transpired in the caucus, either what you said or what any other member said. I recollect very well that when efforts were made to reach a unanimity of opinion I recognized at all times the right of every Senator to the possession of his own judgment and the registering of that when the vote was taken.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I will not resort to the unseemly procedure of calling witnesses to contradict a Senator, because I am sure the Senator states his recollection. But I am absolutely positive that he is mistaken.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the junior Senator from Texas yield to the senior Senator from Texas?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield always to my colleague.

Mr. CULBERSON. The statement made by my colleague is not only correct to the extent he has made it, but the records of the caucus show that the Senator from Colorado voted for the resolution.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. It seems that ample preparations have been made to overwhelm me by reason of the stand I have taken. I will not gainsay the record, because I do not believe that any official of a Democratic caucus would make a wrong record. It is not impossible, Mr. President, that without due reflection I did vote for such a resolution. But it is true that upon due reflection, when I was compelled by reason of my attitude upon the matter that is before the Senate to investigate what the rights and the duties of Senators are, I, in the line of my duty, have receded from that.

I do not recall what the record recites. I do not pretend to contradict it. If I thus voted, I can only say I regret that I thus voted, that such a vote is in conflict with my sense of justice and with the duties of Senators under their oaths in this Chamber. Whatever inconsistency may exist between that record and my conduct now, let it stand. I bear it cheerfully whatever censure or misunderstanding it may bring. It does not change the eternal truth. It does not change the obligations upon Senators under the Constitution and under their oaths of office.

Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I can only say that if that was my vote it was an error, and that that error will never again be committed. In the future, as I had hoped in the past, I recognize the absolute right of every Senator upon every question that is submitted, every act of Congress, to vote absolutely without such coercion as such resolutions bring into existence.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado does himself an injustice in the suggestion that preparations were made for his discomfiture. So far from having made any preparation myself, I did not know until after 11 o'clock to-day that the doctor would say I could leave the bedside of a sick boy. I have not for three days spoken to my colleague except to answer his inquiry as to that sick child. I had no more thought that my colleague had this record in his possession than I have that the Senator from Colorado will now stand up before the Senate and confess his error.

I might have known that whatever was to be had about it my colleague would have [laughter], because, through an acquaintance with him extending over my entire public life in Texas, I have never known him to face a situation for which he was not prepared. I am led to believe from the fact that he had this record that if I had not made the poor reply I have made he would have made a better one to the Senator from Colorado; and I regret that I have occupied the attention of the Senate without preparation instead of having yielded it to him, who is always prepared.

The Senator from Colorado ought not to leave it in the record that he supposes that his colleagues would conspire for the sake of his embarrassment. I will do him greater honor than he does us. I will say that I believe he is above conspiring for the discomfiture of a fellow-Senator. I believe he is an honest man. But I also believe that he is one of those emotional natures who, being wrong, persist in error and defend it, whether he can successfully defend it or not.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I am afraid the Senator will not accept my good opinion of him, but I will yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do object to the term "conspiracy."

Mr. BAILEY. But you stated that preparation had been made——

Mr. PATTERSON. Preparation—oh, well!

Mr. BAILEY. If that does not mean it I do not understand the English language any better than the Senator understands the rule of a Democratic caucus.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Texas had every reason to believe, as he says himself, that preparation would be made.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Texas says he knew if there was anything that could be brought into the Senate of which his colleague had knowledge it would be here.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator himself—let me interrupt him——

Mr. PATTERSON. No; but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator must let me interrupt him to say that I said it, and I stated that I said it, because I knew my colleague was always prepared for every situation, and not with reference to this particular one.

Mr. PATTERSON. But, Mr. President, that is neither here nor there. The thing that causes me regret is that what has been read by the Senator from Texas will becloud the real issue; that instead of Senators taking into full consideration their real duty, imposed by the obligations of the office they fill and the oath they have taken, they may reach the conclusion that because inconsistency has been shown in the Senator who has stood for the right of independent voting in this body, therefore such caucuses should be continued and that they are fully justified. Men, Mr. President, are frequently changing their views and changing their positions.

Mr. BAILEY. And then they ought to change their parties.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, Mr. President, that belongs to each individual member of a party, and neither sneers nor innuendoes of that kind will have the slightest effect upon me in my relations to my party. I have said nothing that calls for such a suggestion or remark from the Senator from Texas. I only wanted to emphasize the danger that a condition such as this will bring to the principle for which I am contending. And yet I fully realize, Mr. President, that there is nothing, or should be nothing, in the membership or the constitution of this body that will create any danger that considerable bodies of this membership will permanently reduce themselves, in whatever numbers they may meet, to the level of a ward caucus.

If I can be satisfied that the matter will not be confused by reason of the efforts of the two Senators from Texas, then I have no feeling of regret for anything that has occurred, whether to-day or in the past.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado would doubtless like to modify that last statement. He would like to save for himself an expression of regret that he voted that way in the Democratic caucus. He must always regret that, because under his view, such a rule invades the sanctity of a Senator's oath and denies him the right to represent his State.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, when I, in connection with any number of Senators, will pass a resolution that has for its purpose the coercion of a Senator into voting against his conviction, or if he does not so vote that he shall stand before his constituency as a bolter from his party, either one way or the other, I have no question about what my attitude should be and what the real fact and the real truth of the question is.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, for the first time the Senator from Colorado has almost stated the question as we understand it. The only effect of such a resolution as we have adopted and disobedience on the part of the Senator is upon his standing at home and not upon his vote in the Senate. The Senator is free to defy the caucus and to vote as his conscience directs. He only takes a responsibility at home between his Democratic constituents and his Democratic associates here.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Texas has stated it correctly. The object of a caucus resolution is to have effect upon the status of the Senator at home. It is to make him realize that, unless he surrenders his convictions at the command of two-thirds of his colleagues, he will be denounced as a bolter at home, and men know what that means, especially in the States of the South. Men know that southern society for self-protection has gathered under the Democratic banner, and within the Democratic fold; and to declare by resolution that a Senator or Member bolts his party is to eliminate him in the South from future public life and to relegate him to the shades of privacy.

It is to that, Mr. President, I object. We know human nature well enough to realize that too many men, for the sake of holding a position that is so honorable, for the purpose of remaining in the body with which they hope their career in life shall be pemanently connected, will, rather than be declared bolters, and thus retired to private life, submit their convictions to the command of other Senators. It is for that reason, Mr. President, that I say the caucus is cruel; that it is coercive; that it is indefensible. It seems to me as though it was the ghost of antebellum days rising in its perfect physical being to yet coerce and intimidate and drive Senators from their duty.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I waive as unworthy of notice that reference to the spirit of antebellum days. That must be intended as an appeal to the other side of the Chamber to adopt his resolution.

The Senator from Colorado betrays in his last interruption that his interest is not in himself, but in some southern Democrat who may be coerced. The Senator may possess his soul in patience. There is no southern Democrat here who will hesitate to defy a caucus when his conscience requires him to do it, and the Senator may be sure that such a southern Democrat can go among his people and defend his conduct, if he can satisfy them that he was right and that two-thirds of his Democratic colleagues were wrong.

Mr. President, the very purpose of this effort at party discipline is this, and only this, that whenever a Senator defies the decision of the majority, he must take the consequences at home. Let me say to the Senator that he underestimates the courage and the integrity of Senators, if I know them, when he assumes that a Senator will hesitate what to do under those circumstances. Why will the Senator from Colorado assume that other Senators possess less courage than he? He defies the caucus, and appeals to his people to justify his course; then why assume that any other Senator lacks courage to pursue a similar course?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish. If no other Senator is lacking in courage, the caucus action exerts no influence upon the destiny of the Republic, nor will it produce the least effect upon the passage of a bill or the ratification of a treaty; and it is limited in consequence to the personal fortunes of the Senator. As I view it, the unity of a party is incomparably more important than the personal fortunes of any Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, one of the mistakes the Senator from Texas is making is in supposing that the twenty Senators who comprised the two-thirds of this caucus are the Democratic party.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not suppose that, but I think they come nearer to being the Democratic party than does the Senator from Colorado. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado has never presumed to be anything else than his own keeper. The Senator from Colorado does not now at least undertake to coerce or drive any other Senator to vote against his will.

Mr. President, my only reference to southern Senators was for the purpose of submitting it to the common sense, the judgment, and the experience of the individual members of this body. No ad captandum appeal can change the frailties of human nature; no language that any man can employ can make me or others, Mr. President, other than men with the weaknesses of men and the vanity of men, subject to the control of the agencies that will control most men.

Mr. President, one of the dangers of the caucus is that just such great men, such aggressive men, such preponderating men, such self-asserting men as the Senator from Texas will overwhelm the judgment of those who are weaker, who are not so aggressive and so insistent. It places the weak at the mercy of the strong; and it will not meet the question by the Senator suggesting that I am again casting reflections upon Senators in this body, for there are in this body strong Senators and weak

Senators; there are in this body men who impress their personality and their convictions upon almost all with whom they come into association.

I have seen it here, in caucuses and elsewhere, where one strong, aggressive, preponderating, irresistible human force carries with him all the rest; and they have had only to wait a few days to realize that they had indeed been weak. The caucus is for just such purposes as that, to give the strong and the powerful superior influence and weight in party measures, to use undue influence in bringing others to their views of thinking; and I have no doubt in the world but that when I have listened to the Senator I have been influenced in the matter of votes here and elsewhere; and it is only human nature that such should be the case. Therefore I say, Mr. President, that when the caucus goes beyond the matter of consultation, of giving advice, of urging duty—when it goes beyond that and enters into the field of force, force, Mr. President, is the ruling power, and not justice and reason.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, for the third and for the last time I observe that this is merely a rule defining a Senator's duty as a Democrat. That Senator is at perfect liberty, whenever the importance of the question or the force of his convictions, or both, shall render it impossible to obey the caucus, to defy it, and to vote precisely as he would had no caucus action been taken. If he does defy it, he then settles with the Democratic people of his own State. If they agree with him, they return him; if they disagree with him, they may or not defeat him. Thus the only effect of a caucus action is that it involves the personal fortunes of a Senator.

My own opinion is that it is taking an unfair advantage of the Democratic party to call upon its members in the various States to choose members of the legislature, who, in their turn, and under the operation of a caucus rule, choose a Senator, thus giving him the benefit of the party organization, the fruit of the party victory, and then, when elevated to the highest legislative assembly in the world, for him to despise the rule that brought him to this exalted station and proclaim his independence of the party.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have detained the Senate too long. To conclude the whole matter, and not for the purpose of contradicting the Senator from Colorado—because that is unnecessary—but in order that the country may know just how far the Democratic caucus has proceeded with the consent of all the Senators, except two on that occasion, I ask to have those resolutions read in order that they may appear in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Democratic caucus, Tuesday, December 15, 1903.

* * * * * * *

The caucus then took up for consideration the resolution offered by Senator BLACKBURN, which is as follows:

"Resolved, That hereafter all members of the Senate Democratic caucus shall be bound to vote in accordance with its decisions, made by a two-thirds vote of all its members, on all questions except those involving a construction of the Constitution, or upon which a Senator has made pledges to his constituents or received instructions from the legislature of a State which he represents."

After full discussion Senator MALLORY, of Florida, offered the following amendment to the resolution:

"Provided, This rule shall not apply to the action of Senators on the pending Cuban reciprocity bill or the pending Panama Canal treaty."

After discussion, the amendment to the resolution was rejected by the following vote:

Yeas: Messrs. Bacon, Bate, Berry, Clay, Cockrell, Foster of Louisiana, McCreary, McEnery, Mallory, Simmons, Taliaferro. Total, 11.

Nays: Messrs. Bailey, Blackburn, Carmack, Daniel, Dubois, Gibson, Gorman, Latimer, McLaurin, Martin, Morgan, Overman, Pettus, Stone, Tillman. Total, 15.

The question recurring on the original resolution offered by Senator Blackburn, the same was adopted by the following vote:

Yeas: Messrs. Bacon, Bailey, Bate, Berry, Blackburn, Carmack, Clay, Daniel, Dubois, Foster of Louisiana, Gibson, Gorman, Latimer, McCreary, McLaurin, Martin, Morgan, Overman, Patterson, Pettus, Simmons, Stone, Tillman. Total, 23.

Nays: Messrs. Mallory, Taliaferro. Total, 2.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to occupy any more time than is necessary to very briefly reply to the last remarks made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] as to the attitude I have taken against control by his caucus in view of the fact that I had been elected announcing myself a Democrat, and that I showed by this action that I despised those who elected me to the position. I wish to say that, on the contrary, I have assumed that attitude because I respect them, because I know what they expect of me, and because I know what my duty is to them, and that is not to surrender my individual vote upon any proposed law into the keeping of any Senator or any number of Senators, and should I do that with the light I now have on the treaty, I feel, Mr. President, that I would be betraying the men through whose instrumentality I have been elected to fill this great office.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. If it is true that he is representing his people in his refusal to obey the caucus, it neither injures the Senator nor changes the result in the Senate. Therefore the caucus has neither done him a harm nor has it changed the course of history one particle.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, if I had occupied this floor as long as I did to-day simply to air a personal grievance and to set myself right before my constituency, I would feel ashamed of myself. I have occupied the Senate to-day for the exposition of what I believe is a great principle in legislation. I have stood not that I required any defense at home, for it is my independence, if I may use that word without being accused of vanity, which commends me to every right-thinking Democrat in the State of Colorado.

But, Mr. President, I do not want this rule of caucus to stand as a menace against me and others. The Senator from Texas ought to differentiate between the man seeking to defend himself and the man advocating the establishment of the right principles for party conferences. If I wanted to defend myself I would go to my home; I would not stand before the people of this country, occupying their time and their attention, for I realize that I am of too little importance to do a thing like that; it would be but abnormal vanity.

But, Mr. President, whether it is a law or a treaty, great principles are usually associated with them, and I take it that there is in this question of a party caucus, commanding or degrading members of this body into voting against their will, a great principle involved, and one upon which I believe the country will reflect, and I believe that when the country reflects—aye, even the constituency of the Senator from Texas—he will realize that that constituency believes in maintaining to the utmost the constitutional prerogative of a Senator—if I may use that kingly word—and that they can not be misled or beclouded by an effort to dragoon Senators, even though when the effort is made it may be said it is only intended to affect the standing of a Senator at his home.

Mr. President, to elevate a town primary or a county caucus to the dignity of Senators in this body is impossible. The people will believe that a member of this body, bound by oath to maintain the relations of a State to the Congress and to the country, can not measure his duty either by what the Senator from Texas or other Senators would do in national or State or county conventions, but by the dignity of this body, the relation which it bears to the Government, the rights of the State to honest and independent representation, and the bounden duty of every Senator to act in accordance with his oath and solemn convictions of right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from Colorado desire to have made of his resolution?

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the resolution will continue to lie on the table subject to call at any time by any Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 7, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MILITARY RESERVATION IN ALABAMA.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. 133) for use of the military reservation in Alabama for the erection of a public building, with the recommendation that the bill and accompanying report be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Gounds.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There was no objection.

RAILROAD RATE REGULATION.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad rate bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. VREELAND in the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, from the time when legislatures and parliaments first began to legislate public highways have been held to be common carriers. The turnpikes and the ferryboats have been regulated by law, and the amount they can legally exact for their service is fixed by statute. The old mill on the creek, where I used to carry corn to be made into meal, was regulated by law, and one-eighth was the limit the miller could exact as toll. There is no difference in principle between a turnpike or plank road 1 mile long and a railroad 1,000 miles long. They both exist under a charter granted by the State; both are public highways; both are used by the people upon the payment of just and reasonable toll. It has always been deemed necessary for the protection of the public who use turnpikes and ferryboats to put them under the supervision of the law. Who can say, then, that the vast railroad systems of the country should not be made amenable to the law? It seems to be too plain for argument that all public highways and common carriers are subject to regulation by law in the interest of the people who created them.

The right to regulate railroads by law being conceded, the only remaining question is, How shall that right be exercised? The bill under consideration is an amendment to an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Therefore we have the whole question of railroad regulation before us, the principal object being to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and to give them authority to enforce their orders and decrees. The bill now being considered is a great improvement on the present law. It comes to us with the unanimous approval of the Interstate Commerce Committee, after a long and patient investigation. It is free from party bias, and bears evidence of an earnest effort to treat the railroads fairly and to protect the interests of the great body of shippers and consumers of the country. It may be that all the evils complained of will not be corrected by the enforcement of the provisions of this bill. Indeed, no reasonable man expects that; but it is a long step in that direction and deserves a fair and patient trial. It is true that some of the evils so justly complained of are not reached by this bill, and perhaps can not be. The great annoyance and loss to shippers which arise from the unreasonable delay in settling overcharges by the railroads, the impolite and ofttimes curt replies made to questions asked for information by shippers and passengers, and the failure of railroads to make proper and convenient connections and to stop their trains where the public interests demand that they should be stopped are very irritating and frequently grossly insulting. I presume, however, that these are matters falling within the province and jurisdiction of State commissions and must be dealt with by them, if at all.

Mr. Chairman, no amount of public criticism could compel me to vote for a measure that to my mind was unjust and unfair to the railroads and that would prevent them from earning a fair rate of interest on their actual investment.

Mr. Justice Harlan, in the Nebraska case, said in part:

> A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the State. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the State. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is under governmental control, though such control must be exercised with due regard to the constitutional guaranties for the protection of its property. It can not be, therefore, admitted that a railroad corporation maintaining a public highway under the authority of the State may fix a rate with a view solely to its own interests and ignore the rights of the public. But the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad are exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public or the fair value of the services rendered, but in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to its stockholders.

This, to my mind, is a temperate and well considered deliverance from one of the most distinguished jurists in the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, transportation methods have been greatly revolutionized in this country since railroad construction began in earnest in the fifties. Then the railroad builder was a pioneer. The country, as a rule, was sparsely settled, and large cities were unknown, as compared with the present time. So it was that railroads were encouraged and given a free hand, and were permitted to fix and collect such tolls as seemed to their promoters to be necessary to encourage their construction.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who opened the discussion for the committee on this bill, so well described the conditions that existed in the early days of railroad transportation in this country that I quote from his speech, as follows:

> When the fathers established the Government of the United States and adopted the Constitution as its bill of rights, they wisely delegated to Congress control over all commerce among the States. At that time there were but thirteen colonies from which States could be made, and they occupied the little territory east of the Alleghenies and in New England. Commerce then was limited, but the means for transportation were so crude that its movements were more difficult than those of to-day. As a legal basis of procedure in the exercise of government the common law was adopted, and that law treated common carriers as public servants and subject to governmental control, and provided that all rates and regulations charged or imposed by them should be just and reasonable.
> From the time when man produced more than he consumed and desired other than what he produced, carriers became important. Settlements were made in the New World on the seashores and on the banks of rivers where transportation by water was possible, but each man at first was his own carrier, and he exchanged his for his neighbor's products. With thrift and enterprise a surplus greater than the needs of immediate neighborhood exchanges was created, and the common carrier became a necessity. At first the Government, recognizing the need, entered into the business of carrying products for the benefit of the people; highways were built, boat lines established, and canals dug. These were operated either without charge to the people or by imposing a charge upon the user of the means of transportation. In the early forties the railroad was born, and regions remote from navigable waters were opened up to settlement. Some wild dreamer of the Revolutionary times may have had a vision of the twentieth-century commerce, but such vision was never expressed, and certainly it never entered into the mind of the statesmen of early days what wonderful things were to come to pass. Then wants were simple and desire was modest. The luxuries of yesterday have become necessities of to-day. Inventive genius has revolutionized past ideals and ancient methods; ignorance, superstition, and religious fanaticism and bigotry, which once blocked the way of progress and blinded the eyes of genius, have been ruthlessly crushed to death beneath advancing civilization, which has strengthened with contest and grown wise and audacious with experience, until to-day nothing is sacred but eternal right and nothing impossible to him who wills.

Mr. Chairman, in the early fifties only a few miles of railroad were built and in operation in this country, transporting a few thousand tons of freight and a very limited number of passengers. In fifty years we have considerably more than 200,000 miles of railroad in operation, carrying annually many million tons of freight and 1,000,000,000 passengers. Trade statistics for the year 1905 show a phenomenal degree of prosperity and increase of business conducted by the railroads. It is estimated that if the product of the farms, mines, and factories had been moved at one time it would have filled 33,184,857 freight cars. These cars, if made up into one train, would extend for a distance of 224,400 miles, or a distance equal to nine times around the earth. If this train, with the locomotives necessary to haul it, should be started out into space on a trip to the moon, the leading engine would be puffing through the valleys of the earth's satellite before the conductor's caboose had rolled out of the freight yard at the starting point. To store the engines and cars would require every mile of railroad in the United States. These vast and bewildering figures demonstrate the necessity for regulation and control. We all recognize the fact that without railroads the country would be relegated to the primitive methods of transportation and travel, and no man in his senses desires that. Railroads are the greatest agencies known to man when development and progress are considered. That the capital invested in these great arteries of trade and commerce should yield a just return to the owners no fair-minded man will question; but when they insist that they should be permitted to earn large dividends on fictitious values, on bonds and stock several times the real value of the property, the people, who have been so liberal in the past in bestowing benefits and franchises on railroads, have just cause for complaint.

The enactment of legislation looking to the control and regulation of these great aggregations of capital and to prevent extortion and discrimination has been the Democratic contention for many years. The first party declaration on this subject was made in 1896 by the Democratic convention at Chicago. I had the honor of representing in part the State of Alabama in that convention as a delegate at large. The delegation did me the honor of electing me as their representative on the resolutions committee, and I was one of the subcommittee which framed the following plank in the platform adopted by the convention, which reads as follows:

[Declaration from Democratic platform, 1896.]

> The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a strict control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restriction and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

Again, in 1900, we declared:

[Declarations from Democratic platform, 1900.]

CORPORATE INTERFERENCE IN GOVERNMENT.

> Corporations should be protected in all their rights and their legitimate interests should be respected, but any attempt by corporations to
